THE SILENT WOOING.

WE walked along the yellow beach
With lingering steps—Aimée and I—
My love had grown too deep for speech,
And hope too faint for e'en a sigh.

And far we went, yet neither spoke:
Aimée seemed lost in fancies sweet;
The tide rolled softly in, and broke
In sighing kisses at her feet.

A merry breeze that came to seek
For sport, wooed ringlets from her hair,
Kissed the fresh fairness of her cheek
And left a rosy token there.

I longed, oh, happy wind and wave,
That I might dare your soft caress—
Seek on her lips the kiss you gave,
And all my lifelong love confess!

My heart's sharp pain gave Courage spur,
But words refused my lips to move:
My yearning hands I stretched to her,
While Hope and Doubt still vainly strove.

Oh, joy! Her soft eyes sought my face!
Dear eyes—with smiles and tears divine!
And with a shy and tender grace
She put her thrilling hands in mine.

Roll in and break, soft, wooing tide!
Vain breezes, bring your softest balms!
Wind, wave, nor all of earth beside
Can win her from my folding arms.

CLYTIE.

INIGOINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 31st, 1866.

I FEEL a pleasure in writing down the last days of these months—driving the finishing nail into their coffin-lids. For they cheat one so. Never a month dawned that it did not whisper of some good that it was going to bring me in its course, but I see the moons grow, and fill, and finally fade away without obtaining a glimpse of the promised blessing.

These wretched, cheating months—they take away my friends from me and bring back only strangers in return. And I feel that each one, for all its purrings and the soft velvety tread with which it glides along, is in reality whirling me rapidly and recklessly on towards the end of a journey which I am not over-ambitious to reach.

Some persons may like to > ——nightly pitch their tents

> A day's march nearer home, but I was always very fond of camping out, and had just as lief settle down here in the woods, where I feel well acquainted, permanently. Were I indeed going home—to a place I had visited before and was familiar with—I shouldn't mind it much. But to my thinking there isn't much fun in travelling unless you know where your ticket is taking you to. Riding on a railway route one is generally eager to reach the end of the journey if he knows that something snug awaits him there and that little danger is to be apprehended. But it is different if taking an excursion trip, at a crazy rate of speed over a road on which no return tickets are issued and with an uncertainty about the way that the switch is turned at the end, and the depot at which you are to be dropped.

To anticipate a warm fire upon the hearth of the home towards which you are marching and nightly nearing is pleasant enough, but to have it hinted that there is perhaps too much of a blaze there—that there is a strong probability of finding it altogether too warm to be agreeable—is not calculated to develop any extraordinary enthusiasm in the mind of the tourist who has always found himself comfortable in summer without blankets.

If the Department of the Gulf were only one from which all newspapers—literary weeklies as well as illiterate dailies—were excluded, I should be comparatively easy. But I have an idea that the place is full of editors, that as many and as wretched journals are published there as on earth—the only difference being that they are printed on asbestos paper—that I shall have a connection with one of them, be obliged to write whether I feel like it or not, and that there will be a constant call for copy from the throats of a dozen devils instead of one. Critics will be found there, too, picking one up on little typographical errors, and sitting in judgment on every slip of the pen or brain which an over-worked writer chances to commit.

If all the editors and critics that deserve perdition find their way thither, upon my word I pity the head of the Department. Like the old Scotch minister, I should add to my prayers a postscript for the "puir de'il." He will be dictated to on the manner of governing his kingdom, his policy will be abused and found fault with on all occasions, his family affairs will be brought before the public, and all Pandemonium generally will be kept in an uproar. On the whole, I think he will find it necessary to either suppress the press or grant all gentlemen connected with it permanent leaves of absence.

If THE CALIFORNIAN was only where I sometimes wish it was, they would have at least one excellent, readable, and reliable family journal in Tophet.

It would of course be deprived of the assistance of my pen, but then so many of its other contributors would be there that I would scarcely be missed. Under such favorable "climatic influences," I have an idea that the "Condensed Novelist" would be more brilliant than ever.

None must argue from what has been said that I do not like THE CALIFORNIAN, for on the coutrary I am one of its firmest friends and certainly one of its greatest admirers. I, perhaps, can say what few others can—viz: that I read every article it contains, carefully through, if not understandingly, even the editorials and book notices.

But for all that, acting on the precious truth blazoned in the motto at the head of the paper, about there being a place for all things—I scarcely think the place for THE CALIFORNIAN is California. Intending to make this State my permanent residence, I want it out of my way—for that reason I have often wished it in Tophet. It is my Delilah, for it keeps me writing these wretched papers through mercenary motives when I ought to be employed upon some solemn journal like the New York Nation, discussing the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, or writing leaders upon the immortality of the soul. I like the Nation; it is so grand, gloomy and peculiar. Application has been made by its editors to engage me for their San Francisco correspondent, but I'm afraid my style is not sprightly enough for them. I have recommended the Theologian of the Era for the situation, and it wouldn't surprise me any day to hear that he had got it, for they are fond of recondite treatises upon subjects that are not cared about, and of publishing articles that nobody reads.

The present reason of my disgust with THE CALIFORNIAN is to find that this week they have shouldered off the theatres upon me for notice. Perhaps they imagine that, because I attend places of amusement very seldom, and was never known to sit but two plays through in my life—these being my own, and I still live—I will notice them impartially.

Well, to begin with Maguire's—here a Dutch joke occurs to me, why didn't I write it my quires?—the Academy of Music isn't open, tho principal reason being because it is closed.

> The minstrel boys up the river have gone,
> With their wild (very wild) harps slung behind them.

I'm glad they did not leave them behind with us. That is the kindest thing I am permitted to say about them, because they don't advertise.

Go to the wall, you niggards, and learn to advertise.

The Opera House has been open all the week: Seven Sisters on Monday and Tuesday for the benefit of the female Zouaves. On Wednesday evening Walter M. Leman took a benefit. The public recognizing the fact that he seldom appears to them in the attitude of a beneficiary, gave him a good house, Miss Emily Thorne—who from her frequent volunteering might be a bounty jumper instead of a benefit bestower—volunteered for the occasion. Then, on Thursday evening, Jackson had a benefit, Jackson's son also appearing. The elder Jackson personated the first Napoleon, and certainly looks very much like him, but I've never heard anybody say that the resemblance goes much further. The younger Jackson is such a favorite of mine that I am afraid to say much about him—people might think me prejudiced. So let me briefly say that the house was crowded and that everything went off capitally. Last night they had a repetition of Thursday's bill, for the benefit of Wells who was arrested for being a man he wasn't and discharged for not being the man he was—Mr. Maguire generously donating the house. As the paper is just going to press, and the performance does not come off for some six or eight hours yet, I am unable to speak critically about it, or even to say how large the house was—but just take it for granted it was of the usual size, for I've not heard of its being enlarged for the occasion. This afternoon and evening they give The Enchanted Beauty, and it promises to be gorgeous. I shall be there and contribute to the general effect of the piece.

At the Metropolitan, they are doing so well that anything I can say will scarcely help them. Talk of pulling the wool over people's eyes—in this instance it is a Sheep's Foot that has bonneted them completely.

Don Guzman still pops up from unexpected places at unexpected times in the most unexpected way, declaring that she is as brave as her sword or any other man's. Still she escapes from limbo—a natural result of the freedom of those limbs which are seen sprouting so naturally from marvellous trunks. Delicia Maudeville Thorne continues to delight everybody as "Leonora"—causing a sigh that she is not a Leonora pro me. Leach is capital as ever, and Woodhull has improved the quality as well as the quantity of his jokes—the adorable particularly is bettered. Ruby, Roundy—all of them, with a few notable exceptions, are as good as their parts will allow them to be. In the skating scene, Roundy and Wiethoff distinguish themselves—so does Acosta, but in a different way. What the latter lacks in skating, however, she fully makes up in pirouetting. What can I say about the Buislays? Simply what I have before said, that, as gymnasts and acrobats, it is my opinion they have no equals in the world. To miss that double-stick combat one night would be a double deprivation. Nor must I forget the anvil-chorus in which Wunderlich strikes such a wonderful lick. I trust he will never change his bass, for it is magnificent, and I always accompany the whole chorus with a double hand cancan, to the visible annoyance of my next neighbor, who is bald and wears a scratch-wig. I publish his misfortune thus broadly to avenge myself for the indignant looks he gives me because of my volunteer performance.

Does the Sheep's Foot draw so well because there is something fetish about it? Every night the house is crowded. Some people don't like to see this Foot out-legging the legitimate drama (Te-he! Isn't that a nice joke?) But I intend to write an article next week explaining why this is thus, in a philosophical way, after the manner of my friend "The Mufti."

Before closing this brilliant effort of dramatic criticism, I must compliment young Leon Beneux on the way he has put the piece on and stage-managed it. Considering his inexperience and the impromptu way in which he dropped into the position he occupies, his success is indeed remarkable.

INIGO.

IN THE CHURCHYARD.

O YE dead! O ye dead! you are lying at your rest;
I am lying thus above you, and I know not which is best;
Just between us are the grasses, and the gravel, and the clay,
But they measure not the distance into which you pass away.

Reaching downward grow the rootlets of the flowers and the heath,
But they cannot touch the bodies that are lying underneath—
For the eye and ear hath wasted, and the busy heart decayed—
Dust to dust, you're all resolving, as from dust you all were made.

I look upon the sunshine, and the sea-waves as they roll,
And the clouds in high mid heaven—Are such sights before your soul?
I hear the breeze and streamlet, and the curlew, and the sheep
Bleating far upon the mountain—Do they wake you out of sleep?

Do you know the change of seasons, as of old they come and go—
Now the flowers, now the fruitage, now the fading, now the snow?
Do you feel a sudden trembling, when the loved ones tread above,
And the echo of their footsteps is the echo of their love?

Do you find a thrill of sorrow, as the husband or the wife
Dry their tears for the departed, and begin to search their life—
Till another takes his station in the fields you used to tread,
And another takes your pillow, and upon it lays her head?

Do such earthly matters move you? You are past from hence away,
Into larger joys and sorrows than belong to this our day;
And you look down on the whirling of this life with calmer eyes,
That have learnt to bear the measure of Eternity's surprise.

Are you near us? Can you see us? Can you watch us in our ways?
Do you witness all the evil, all the good of all our days?
Do you, knowing all things better, wonder at us in our strife,
As we clutch the tinsel gilding, and pass by the Crown of Life?

O ye dead! O ye dead! young and old, and small and great,
Now you know your doom of sorrow, or your high and blest estate,
And I wonder as I ponder, what you feel and what you see;
As according to the sowing, so your reaping now must be.

O ye dead! O ye dead! small and great, and young and old,
I am longing for your secret, and my longing makes me bold—
But since the day they brought you from your houses on the hill,
You have kept your secret steadfast, and I know will keep it still.

THE CAULDRON OF OIL.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

I.

ABOUT one French league distant from the city of Toulouse, there is a village called Croix-Daurade. In the military history of England, this place is associated with a famous charge of the eighteenth hussars, which united two separate columns of the British army, on the day before the Duke of Wellington fought the battle of Toulouse. In the criminal history of France, the village is memorable as the scene of a daring crime, which was discovered and punished under circumstances sufficiently remarkable to merit preservation in the form of a plain narrative.

THE PERSONS OF THE DRAMA.

In the year seventeen hundred, the resident priest of the village of Croix-Daurade was Monsieur Pierre-Celestin Chaubard. He was a man of no extraordinary energy or capacity, simple in his habits, and sociable in his disposition. His character was irreproachable; he was strictly conscientious in the performance of his duties; and he was universally respected and beloved by his parishioners.

Among the members of his flock, there was a family named Siadoux. The head of the household, Saturnin Siadoux, had been long established in business at Croix-Daurade as an oil manufacturer. At the period of the events now to be narrated, he had attained the age of sixty, and was a widower. His family consisted of five children—three young men, who helped him in the business, and two daughters. His nearest living relative was his sister, the widow Mirailhe.

The widow resided principally at Toulouse. Her time in that city was mainly occupied in winding up the business affairs of her deceased husband, which had remained unsettled for a considerable period after his death, through delays in realizing certain sums of money owing to his representative. The widow had been left very well provided for—she was still a comely, attractive woman—and more than one substantial citizen of Toulouse had shown himself anxious to persuade her into marrying for the second time. But the widow Mirailhe lived on terms of great intimacy and affection with her brother Siadoux and his family; she was sincerely attached to them, and sincerely unwilling, at her age, to deprive her nephews and nieces, by a second marriage, of the inheritance, or even of a portion of the inheritance, which would otherwise fall to them on her death. Animated by these motives, she closed her doors resolutely on all suitors who attempted to pay their court to her, with the one exception of a master-butcher of Toulouse, whose name was Cantegrel.

This man was a neighbor of the widow's, and had made himself useful by assisting her in the business complications which still hung about the realization of her late husband's estate. The preference which she showed for the master-butcher was, thus far, of the purely negative kind. She gave him no absolute encouragement; she would not for a moment admit that there was the slightest prospect of her ever marrying him—but, at the same time, she continued to receive his visits, and she showed no disposition to restrict the neighborly intercourse between them, for the future, within purely formal bounds. Under these circumstances, Saturnin Siadoux began to be alarmed, and to think it time to bestir himself. He had no personal acquaintance with Cantegrel, who never visited the village; and Monsieur Chaubard (to whom he might otherwise have applied for advice) was not in a position to give an opinion; the priest and the master-butcher did not even know each other by sight. In this difficulty, Siadoux bethought himself of inquiring privately at Toulouse, in the hope of discovering some scandalous passages in Cantegrel's early life, which might fatally degrade him in the estimation of the widow Mirailhe. The investigations, as usual in such cases, produced rumors and reports in plenty, the greater part of which dated back to a period of the butcher's life when he had resided in the ancient town of Narbonne. One of these rumors, especially, was of so serious a nature, that Siadoux determined to test the truth or falsehood of it, personally, by travelling to Narbonne. He kept his intention a secret, not only from his sister and his daughters, but also from his sons; they were young men, not over-patient in their tempers—and he doubted their discretion. Thus, nobody knew his real purpose but himself, when he left home.

His safe arrival at Narbonne was notified in a letter to his family. The letter entered into no particulars relating to his secret errand; it merely informed his children of the day when they might expect him back, and of certain social arrangements which he wished to be made to welcome him on his return. He proposed, on his way home, to stay two days at Castelnaudry, for the purpose of paying a visit to an old friend who was settled there. According to this plan, his return to Croix-Daurade would be deferred until Tuesday, the twenty-sixth of April, when his family might expect to see him about sunset, in good time for supper. He further desired that a little party of friends might be invited to the meal, to celebrate the twenty-sixth of April (which was a feast-day in the village,) as well as to celebrate his return. The guests whom he wished to be invited were, first, his sister; secondly, Monsieur Chaubard, whose pleasant disposition made him a welcome guest at all the village festivals; thirdly and fourthly, two neighbors, business men like himself, with whom he lived on terms of the friendliest intimacy. That was the party; and the family of Siadoux took especial pains, as the time approached, to provide a supper worthy of the guests, who had all shown the heartiest readiness in accepting their invitations.

This was the domestic position, these were the family prospects, on the morning of the twenty-sixth of April—a memorable day, for years afterward, in the village of Croix-Daurade.

II.

THE EVENTS OF THE DAY.

Beside the curacy of the village church, good Monsieur Chaubard held some small ecclesiastical preferment in the cathedral church of St. Stephen at Toulouse. Early in the forenoon of the twenty-sixth, certain matters connected with this preferment took him from his village curacy to the city—a distance which has been already described as not greater than one French league, or between two and three English miles.

After transacting his business, Monsieur Chaubard parted with his clerical brethren, who left him by himself, in the sacristy (or vestry) of the church. Before he had quitted the room, in his turn, the beadle entered it, and inquired for the Abbé de Mariotte, one of the officiating priests attached to the cathedral.

"The Abbé has just gone out," replied Monsieur Chaubard. "Who wants him?"

"A respectable-looking man," said the beadle. "I thought he seemed to be in some distress of mind, when he spoke to me."

"Did he mention his business with the Abbé?"

"Yes, sir; he expressed himself as anxious to make his confession immediately."

"In that case," said Monsieur Chaubard, "I may be of use to him in the Abbé's absence—for I have my authority to act here as confessor. Let us go into the church, and see if this person feels disposed to accept my services."

When they went into the church, they found the man walking backward and forward in a restless, disordered manner. His looks were so strikingly suggestive of some serious mental perturbation, that Monsieur Chaubard found it no easy matter to preserve his composure, when he first addressed himself to the stranger.

"I am sorry," he began, "that the Abbé de Mariotte is not here to offer you his services——"

"I want to make my confession," said the man, looking about him vacantly, as if the priest's words had not attracted his attention.

"You can do so at once, if you please," said Monsieur Chaubard. "I am attached to this church, and I possess the necessary authority to receive confessions in it. Perhaps, however, you are personally acquainted with the Abbé de Mariotte? Perhaps you would prefer waiting——"

"No!" said the man, roughly. "I would as soon, or sooner, confess to a stranger."

"In that case," replied Monsieur Chaubard, "be so good as to follow me."

He led the way to the confessional. The beadle, whose curiosity was excited, waited a little, and looked after them. In a few minutes, he saw the curtains, which were sometimes used to conceal the face of the officiating priest, suddenly drawn. The penitent knelt with his back turned to the church. There was literally nothing to see—but the beadle waited nevertheless, in expectation of the end.

After a long lapse of time, the curtain was withdrawn, and priest and penitent left the confessional.

The change which the interval had worked in Monsieur Chaubard was so extraordinary, that the beadle's attention was altogether withdrawn, in the interest of observing it, from the man who had made the confession. He did not remark by which door the stranger left the church—his eyes were fixed on Monsieur Chaubard. The priest's naturally ruddy face was as white as if he had just arisen from a long sickness—he looked straight before him, with a stare of terror—and he left the church as hurriedly as if he had been a man escaping from prison; left it without a parting word, or a farewell look, although he was noted for his courtesy to his inferiors on all ordinary occasions.

"Good Monsieur Chaubard has heard more than he bargained for," said the beadle, wandering back to the empty confessional, with an interest unusual to him.

The day wore on as quietly as usual in the village of Croix-Daurade. At the appointed time, the supper-table was laid for the guests in the house of Saturnin Siadoux. The widow Mirailhe, and the two neighbors, arrived a little before sunset. Monsieur Chaubard, who was usually punctual, did not make his appearance with them; and when the daughters of Saturnin Siadoux looked out from the upper windows, they saw no signs on the high-road of their father's return.

Sunset came—and still neither Siadoux nor the priest appeared. The little party sat waiting round the table, and waited in vain. Before long, a message was sent up from the kitchen, representing that the supper must be eaten forthwith, or be spoiled; and the company began to debate the two alternatives, of waiting, or not waiting, any longer.

"It is my belief," said the widow Mirailhe, "that my brother is not coming home to-night. When Monsieur Chaubard joins us, we had better sit down to supper."

"Can any accident have happened to my father?" asked one of the two daughters, anxiously.

"God forbid!" said the widow.

"God forbid!" repeated the two neighbors, looking expectantly at the empty supper-table.

"It has been a wretched day for travelling," said Louis, the eldest son.

"And your father's rheumatism makes him averse to travelling in wet weather," suggested the widow, thoughtfully.

"Very true," said the first of the two neighbors, shaking his head piteously at his passive knife and fork.

Another message came up from the kitchen, and peremptorily forbade the company to wait any longer.

"But where is Monsieur Chaubard?" said the widow. "Has he been taking a journey too? Why is he absent? Has anybody seen him to-day?"

"I have seen him to-day," said the youngest son, who had not spoken yet. This young man's name was Jean; he was little given to talking, but he had proved himself, on various domestic occasions, to be the quickest and most observant member of the family.

"Where did you see him?" asked the widow.

"I met him this morning, on his way into Toulouse."

"He has not fallen ill, I hope. Did he look out of sorts when you met him?"

"He was in excellent health and spirits," said Jean. "I never saw him look better—"

"And I never saw him look worse," said the second of the neighbors, striking into the conversation with the aggressive fretfulness of a hungry man.

"What! this morning?" cried Jean, in astonishment.

"No; this afternoon," said the neighbor. "I saw him going into our church here. He was as white as our plates will be—when they come up. And what is almost as extraordinary, he passed without taking the slightest notice of me."

Jean relapsed into his customary silence. It was getting dark; the clouds had gathered while the company had been talking; and, at the first pause in the conversation, the rain, falling again in torrents, made itself drearily audible.

"Dear, dear me!" said the widow. "If it was not raining so hard, we might send somebody to inquire after good Monsieur Chaubard."

"I'll go and inquire," said Thomas Siadoux. "It's not five minute's walk. Have up the supper; I'll take a cloak with me; and if our excellent Monsieur Chaubard is out of his bed, I'll bring him back, to answer for himself."

With those words he left the room. The supper was put on the table forthwith. The hungry neighhors disputed with nobody from that moment, and the melancholy neighbor recovered his spirits.

On reaching the priest's house, Thomas Siadoux found him sitting alone in his study. He started to his feet, with every appearance of the most violent alarm, when the young man entered the room.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Thomas; "I am afraid I have startled you."

"What do you went?" asked Monsieur Chaubard, in a singularly abrupt, bewildered manner.

"Have you forgotten, sir, that this is the night of our supper?" remonstrated Thomas. "My father has not come back; and we can only suppose—"

At those words the priest dropped into his chair again, and trembled from head to foot. Amazed to the last degree by this extraordinary reception of his remonstrance, Thomas Siadoux remembered, at the same time, that he had engaged to bring Monsieur Chaubard back with him; and he determined to finish his civil speech, as if nothing had happened.

"We are all of opinion," he resumed, "that the weather has kept my father on the road. But that is no reason, sir, why you should not make one of us as you promised. Here is a good warm cloak—"

"I can't come," said the priest. "I'm ill; I'm not fit to go out." He sighed bitterly, and hid his face in his hands.

"Don't say that, sir," persisted Thomas. "If you are out of spirits, let us try to cheer you. And you, in your turn, will enliven us. They are all waiting for you at home. Don't refuse, sir," pleaded the young man, "or we shall think we have offended you in some way. You have always been a good friend to our family—"

Monsieur Chauhard again rose from his chair, with a second change of manner, as extraordinary and as perplexiug as the first. His eyes moistened as if the tears were rising in them; he took the hand of Thomas Siadoux, and pressed it long and warmly in his own. There was a curious, mixed expression of pity and fear in the look which he now fixed on the young man.

"Of all the days in the year," he said, very earnestly, "don't douht my friendship to-day. Ill as I am, I will make one of the supper party, for your sake—"

"And for my father' sake?" added Thomas persuasively.

"Let us go to supper," said the priest.

Thomas Siadoux wrapped the cloak round him, and they left the house.

Every one at the table noticed the change in Monsieur Chaubard. He accounted for it by declaring, confusedly, that he was suffering from uervous illness; and then added that he would do his best, notwithstanding, to promote the social enjoyments of the evening. His talk was fragmentary, and his cheerfulness was sadly forced; but he contrived, with these drawhacks, to take his part in the conversation—except in the case when it happened to turn on the absent master of the house. Whenever the name of Saturnin Siadoux was mentioned—either by the neighbors, who politely regretted that he was not present; or by the family, who naturally talked about the resting-place which he might have chosen for the night—Monsieur Chaubard either relapsed into hlank silence, or abruptly changed the topic. Under these circumstances, the company, by whom he was respected and beloved, made the necessary allowance for his state of health; the only person among them, who showed no desire to cheer the priest's spirits, and to humor him in his temporary fretfulness, beiug the silent younger son of Saturnin Siadoux.

Both Louis and Thomas noticed that, from the moment when Monsieur Chaubard's manner first betrayed his singular unwillingness to touch on the subject of their father's absence, Jean fixed his eyes on the priest, with an expression of suspicious attention; aud never looked away from him for the rest of the evening. The young man's absolute silence at table did not surprise his hrothers, for they were accustomed to his taciturn habits. But the sullen distrust betrayed in his close ohservations of the honored guest and friend of the family, surprised and angered them. The priest himself seemed once or twice to be aware of the scrutiny to which he was subjected, and to feel uneasy and offended, as he naturally might. He abstained, however, from openly noticing Jean's strange behavior; and Louis and Thomas were bound, therefore, in common politeness, to abstain from noticing it also.

The inhabitants of Croix-Daurade kept early hours. Toward eleven o'clock the company rose and separated for the night. Except the two neighhors, nohody had enjoyed the supper, and even the two neighbors, having eaten their fill, were as glad to get home as the rest. In the little confusion of parting, Monsieur Chaubard completed the astonishment of the guests at the extraordinary change in him, by slipping away alone, without waiting to hid anybody good night.

The widow Mirailhe and her nieces withdrew to their bedrooms, and left the three hrothers hy themselves in the parlor.

"Jean," said Thomas Siadoux, "I have a word to say to you. You stared at our good Monsieur Chaubard in a very offensive manner all through the evening. What did you mean by it?"

"Wait till to-morrow," said Jean; "and perhaps I may tell you."

He lit his candle, and left them. Both the brothers observed that his hand trembled, and that his manner, never very winning, was, on that night, more serious and more unsociable than usual.

III.

THE YOUNGER BROTHER.

When post-time came on the morning of the twenty-seventh, no letter arrived from Saturnin Siadoux. On consideration the family interpreted this circumstance in a favorable light. If the master of the house had not written to them, it followed, surely, that he meant to make writing unnecessary by returning on that day.

As the hours passed, the widow and her nieces looked out, from time to time, for the absent man. Toward noon, they observed a little assemhly of people approaching the village. Ere long, on a nearer view, they recognized at the head of the assembly, the chief magistrate of Toulouse, in his official dress. He was accompanied by his Assessor (also in his official dress,) by an escort of archers, and hy certain subordinates attached to the town-hall. The last appeared to be carrying some burden, which was hidden from view by the escort of archers. The procession stopped at the house of Saturnin Siadoux; and the two daughters, hastening to the door, to discover what had happened, met the burden which the men were carrying, and saw, stretched on a litter, the dead body of their father.

The corpse had been found that morning on the banks of the river Lers. It was stabbed in eleven places with knife or dagger wounds. None of the valuables about the dead man's person had been touched; his watch and his money were still in his pockets. Whoever had murdered him, had murdered him for vengeance, not for gain.

Some time elapsed before even the male members of the family were sufficiently composed to hear what the officers of justice had to say to them. When this result had been at length achieved, and when the necessary inquiries had heen made, no information of any kind was obtained which pointed to the murderer, in the eye of the law. After expressing his sympathy, and promising that every available means should be tried to effect the discovery of the criminal, the chief magistrate gave his orders to his escort, and withdrew.

When night came, the sister and the daughters of the murdered man retired to the upper part of the house, exhausted by the violence of their grief. The three brothers were left once more alone iu the parlor, to speak together of the awful calamity which had befallen them. They were of hot Southern blood, and they looked on one another with a Southern thirst for vengeance in their tearless eyes.

The silent younger son was now the first to open his lips.

"You charged me yesterday," he said to his hrother Thomas, "with looking strangely at Monsieur Chaubard all the evening; and I answered that I might tell you why I looked at him when to-morrow came. To-morrow has come, and I am ready to tell you."

He waited a little, and lowered his voice to a whisper, when he spoke again.

"When Monsieur Chaubard was at our supper-table last night," he said, "I had it in my mind that something had happened to our father, and that the priest knew it."

The two elder brothers looked at him in speechless astonishment.

"Our father has been brought back to us a murdered man!" Jean went on, still iu a whisper. "I tell you, Louis—and you, Thomas—that the priest knows who murdered him."

Louis and Thomas shrank from their younger brother, as if he had spoken blasphemy.

"Listen," said Jean. "No clue has been found to the secret of the murder. The magistrate has promised to do his best—but I saw in his face that he had little hope. We must make the discovery ourselves—or our father's blood will have cried to us for vengeance, and cried in vain. Remember that—and mark my next words. You heard me say yesterday evening that I had met Monsieur Chaubard on his way to Toulouse in excellent health and spirits. You heard our old friend and neighbor at the supper table contradict me, and declare that he had seen the priest some hours later, go into our church here, with the face of a panic-stricken man. You saw, Thomas, how he behaved when you went to fetch him to our house. You saw, Louis, what his looks were like when he came in. The change was noticed by everybody—what was the cause of it? I saw the cause in the priest's own face, when our father's name turned up in the talk round the supper-table. Did Monsieur Chauhard join in that talk? He was the only person present who never joined in it once. Did he change it, on a sudden, whenever it came his way? It came his way four times; and four times he changed it—trembling, stammering, turning whiter and whiter, but still, as true as the Heaven above us, shifting the talk off himself, every time! Have you brains in your heads? Don't you see, as I see, what this leads to? On my salvation I swear it—the priest knows the hand that killed our father!"

The faces of the two elder brothers darkened vindictively, as the conviction of the truth fastened itself on their minds.

"How could he know it?" they inquired, eagerly.

"He must tell us himself," said Jean.

"And if he hesitates—if he refuses to open his lips?"

"We must open them by main force."

They drew their chairs together after that last answer, and consulted, for some time, in whispers.

When the consultation was over, the brothers rose and went into the room where the dead body of their father was laid out. The three kissed him, in turn, on the forehead—then took hands together, and looked meaningly in each other's faces—then separated. Louis aud Thomas put on their hats, and went at once to the priest's residence; while Jean withdrew, by himself, to the great room at the back of the house, which was used for the purposes of the oil factory.

Only one of the workmen was left in the place. He was watching an immense cauldron of hoiling linseed-oil.

"You can go home," said Jean, patting the man kindly on the shoulder. "There is no hope of a night's rest for me, after the affliction that has befallen us—I will take your place at the cauldron. Go home, my good fellow—go home."

The man thanked him, and withdiew. Jean followed and satisfied himself that he had really left the house. He then returned, and sat down by the boiling cauldron.

Meanwhile, Louis and Thomas presented themselves at the priest's house. He had not yet retired to bed, and he received them kindly—but with the same extraordinary agitation in his face aud manner which had surprised all who saw him on the previous day. The brothers were prepared beforehand with an answer, when he inquired what they wanted of him. They replied immediately that the shock of their father's horrible death had so seriously affected their aunt and their eldest sister, that it was feared the minds of both might give way, unless spiritual consolatiou and assistance were afforded to them that night. The unhappy priest—always faithful and self-sacrificing where the duties of his ministry were in question—at once rose to accompany the young men back to the house. He even put on his surplice, and took the crucifix with him, to impress his words of comfort all the more solemnly on the afflicted women whom he was called on to succor.

Thus innocent of all suspicion of the conspiracy to which he had fallen a victim, he was taken into the room where Jean sat waiting by the cauldron of oil; and the door was locked behind him.

Before he could speak, Thomas Siadoux openly avowed the truth.

"It is we three who want you," he said—"not our aunt, and not our sister. If you answer our questions truly, you have nothing to fear. If you refuse—" He stopped, and looked toward Jean and the boiling cauldron.

Never, at the best of times, a resolute man; deprived, since the day before, of such resources of energy as he possessed, by the mental suffering which he had undergone in secret—the unfortunate priest trembled from head to foot, as the three brothers closed round him. Louis took the crucifix from him. and held it; Thomas forced him to place his right hand on it; Jean stood in front of him and put the questions.

"Our father has heen brought home a murdered man," he said. "Do you know who killed him?"

The priest hesitated; and the two elder hrothers moved him nearer to the cauldron.

"Answer us, on peril of your life," said Jean. "Say, with your hand on the blessed crucifix, do you know the mau who killed our father?"

"I do know him."

"When did you make the discovery?"

"Yesterday."

"Where?"

"At Toulouse."

"Name the murderer."

At those words, the priest closed his hand fast on the crucifix, and rallied his sinking courage.

"Never!" he said firmly. "The knowledge I possess was obtained in the confessional. The secrets of the confessional are sacred. If I betray them, I commit sacrilege. I will die first!"

"Think!" said Jean. "If you keep silence, you screen the murderer. If you keep silence, you are the murderer's accomplice. We have sworn over our father's dead body to avenge him—if you keep silence, we will avenge him ou you. I charge you again, uame the man who killed him."

"I will die first," the priest reiterated, as firmly as hefore.

"Die then!" said Jean. "Die in that cauldron of hoiling oil."

"Give him time," cried Louis and Thomas, earnestly pleading together.

"We will give him time," said the younger brother.

"There is the clock yonder, against the wall. We will count five minutes by it. In those five minutes, let him make his peace with God—or make up his mind to speak."

They waited, watching the clock. In that dreadful interval, the priest dropped on his knees and hid his face. The time passed in dead silence.

"Speak! for your own sake, for our sakes, speak!" said Thomas Siadeux, as the minute hand reached the point at which the five minutes expired.

The priest looked up—his voice died away on his lips—the mortal agony broke out on his face in great drops of sweat—his head sank forward on his breast.

"Lift him!" cried Jean, seizing the priest on one side. "Lift him, and throw him in!"

The two elder brothers advanced a step—and hesitated.

"Lift him, on your oath over our father's body?"

The two brothers seized him on the other side. As they lifted him to a level with the cauldron, the horror of the death that threatened him burst from the lips of the miserable man in a scream of terror. The brothers held him firm at the cauldron's edge. "Name the man!" they said for the last time.

The priest's teeth chattered—he was speechless. But he made a sign with his head—a sign in the affirmative. They placed him in a chair, and waited patiently until he was able to speak.

His first words were words of entreaty. He begged Thomas Siadonx to give him back the crucifix. When it was placed in his possession, he kissed it, and said faintly, "I ask pardon of God for the sin that I am about to commit." He paused; and then looked up at the younger brother, who still stood in front of him. "I am ready," he said. "Question me, and I will answer."

Jean repeated the questions which he had put when the priest was first brought into the room.

"You know the murderer of our father?"

"I know him."

"Since when?"

"Since he made his confession to me yesterday, in the cathedral of Tonlouse."

"Name him."

"His name is Cantegrel."

"The man who wanted to marry our aunt?"

"The same."

"What brought him to the confessional?"

"His own remorse."

"What were the motives for his crime?"

"There were reports against his character; and he discovered that your father had gone privately to Narbonne to make sure that they were true."

"Did our father make sure of their truth?"

"He did."

"Would those discoveries have separated our aunt from Cantegrel, if our father had lived to tell her of them?"

"They would. If your father had lived, he would have told your aunt that Cantegrel was married already; that he had deserted his wife at Narbonne; that she was living there with another man, under another name; and that she had herself confessed it in your father's presence."

"Where was the murder committed?"

"Between Villefranche and this village. Cantegrel had followed your father to Narbonne, and had followed him back again to Villefranche. As far as that place he travelled in company with others, both going and returning. Beyond Villefranche, he was left alone at the ford over the river. There Cantegrel drew the knife to kill him, before he reached home and told his news to your aunt."

"How was the murder committed?"

"It was committed while your father was watering his pony by the bank of the stream. Cantegrel stole on him from behind, and struck him as he was stooping over the saddle-bow."

"This is the truth, on your oath?"

"On my oath, it is the truth."

"You may leave us."

The priest rose from his chair without assistance. From the time when the terror of death had forced him to reveal the murderer's name, a great change had passed over him. He had given his answers with the immovable calmness of a man on whose mind all human interests had lost their hold. He now left the room, strangely absorbed in himself; moving with the mechanical regularity of a sleep-walker; lost to all perception of things and persons about him. At the door he stopped—woke, as it seemed, from the trance that possessed him—and looked at the three brothers with a steady, changeless sorrow, which they had never seen in him before, which they never afterward forgot.

"I forgive you," he said, quietly and solemnly. "Pray for me when my times comes."

With those last words, he left them.

IV.

THE END.

The night was far advanced; but the three brothers determined to set forth instantly for Toulouse, and to place their information in the magistrate's hands, before the morning dawned.

Thus far, no suspicion had occurred to them of the terrible consequences which were to follow their night interview with the priest; they were absolutely ignorant of the punishment to which a man in holy orders exposed himself, if he revealed the secrets of the confessional. No infliction of that punishment had been known in their neighborhood—for, at that time, as at this, the rarest of all priestly offences was a violation of the sacred trust confided to the confessor. Conscious that they had forced the priest into the commission of a clerical offence, the brothers sincerely believed that the loss of his curacy would be the heaviest penalty which the law could exact from him; they entered Toulouse that night, discussing the atonement which they might offer to Monsieur Chaubard, and the means which they might best employ to make his future life easy to him.

The first disclosure of the consequences which would certainly follow the outrage they had committed, was revealed to them when they made their deposition before the officer of justice. The magistrate listened to their narrative with horror vividly expressed in his face and manner.

"Better you had never been born," he said, "than have avenged your father's death as you three have avenged it. Your own act has doomed the guilty and the innocent to suffer alike."

Those words proved prophetic of the truth. The end came quickly, as the priest had foreseen it, when he spoke his parting words.

The arrest of Cantegrel was accomplished without difficulty, the next morning. In the absence of any other evidence on which to justify this proceeding, the private disclosure to the authorities of the secret which the priest had violated, became inevitable. The Parliament of Languedoc was, under these circumstances, the tribunal appealed to; and the decision of that assembly immediately ordered the priest and the three brothers to be placed in confinement, as well as the murderer Cantegrel. Evidence was then immediately sought for, which might convict this last criminal, without any reference to the revelation that had been forced from the priest—and evidence enough was found to satisfy judges whose minds already possessed the foregone certainty of the prisoner's guilt. He was put on his trial, was convicted of the murder, and was condemned to be broken on the wheel. The sentence was rigidly executed, with as little delay as the law would permit.

The cases of Monsieur Chaubard, and of the three sons of Siadoux, next occupied the judges. The three brothers were found guilty of having forced the secret of a confession from a man in holy orders, and were sentenced to death by hanging. A far more terrible expiation of his offence awaited the unfortunate priest. He was condemned to have his limbs broken on the wheel, and to be afterward, while still living, bound to the stake, and destroyed by fire.

Barbarous as the punishments of that period were, accustomed as the population was to hear of their infliction, and even to witness it, the sentences pronounced in these two cases dismayed the public mind; and the authorities were surprised by receiving petitions for mercy from Toulouse, and from all the surrounding neighborhood. But the priest's doom had been sealed. All that could be obtained, by the intercession of persons of the highest distinction, was, that the executioner should grant him the mercy of death before his body was committed to the flames. With this one modification, the sentence was executed, as the sentence had been pronounced, on the curate of Croix-Daurade.

The punishment of the three sons of Siadoux remained to be inflicted. But the people, roused by the death of the ill-fated priest, rose against this third execution with a resolution before which the local government gave way. The cause of the young men was taken up by the hot-blooded populace, as the cause of all fathers and all sons; their filial piety was exalted to the skies; their youth was pleaded in their behalf; their ignorance of the terrible responsibility which they had confronted in forcing the secret from the priest, was loudly alleged in their favor. More than this, the authorities were actually warned that the appearance of the prisoners on the scaffold would be the signal for an organized revolt and rescue. Under this serious pressure, the execution was deferred, and the prisoners were kept in confinement until the popular ferment had subsided.

The delay not only saved their lives, it gave them back their liberty as well. The infection of the popular sympathy had penetrated through the prison doors. All three brothers were handsome, well-grown young men. The gentlest of the three in disposition—Thomas Siadoux—aroused the interest and won the affection of the head-gaoler's daughter. Her father was prevailed on at her intercession to relax a little in his customary vigilance; and the rest was accomplished by the girl herself. One morning, the population of Toulouse heard, with every testimony of the most extravagant rejoicing, that the three brothers had escaped, accompanied by the gaoler's daughter. As a necessary legal formality, they were pursued, but no extraordinary efforts were used to overtake them; and they succeeded, accordingly, in crossing the nearest frontier.

Twenty days later, orders were received from the Capital to execute their sentence in effigy. They were then permitted to return to France, on condition that they never again appeared in their native place, or in any other part of the province of Languedoc. With this reservation they were left free to live where they pleased, and to repent the fatal act which had avenged them on the murderer of their father at the cost of the priest's life.

Beyond this point the official documents do not enable us to follow their career. All that is now known has been now told of the village-tragedy at Croix-Daurade.

A NIGHT IN THE COLISEUM.

I HAVE been a wanderer all my life, a truly migratory bird, and, as such, have had an instinctive conviction that a constant residence in the same spot is not only unpleasant, but unnatural. Added to this, I believe I have a spice of what it is now the fashion to call upper-Bohemianism in my nature; that is to say, although I am no musician, I am devoted to music and its followers; no author, no poet, yet do I number amongst my friends and acquaintances many of the most notable names in the world of literature; no actor, but again the green-rooms and coulisses of many of the first theatres and opera-houses in Europe and America are as familiar ground to me as the shady side of Pall Mall in the month of May. I never drew a line with pencil or brush in my life, yet at home and abroad I have watched in the painters' studios with the greatest interest the progress of many of the finest pictures that have delighted multitudes during the last twenty-five years. If I may say it of myself, I have been tolerated in this sort of society, possibly from a natural appreciativeness and love of the arts, in addition, perhaps, to a certain bonhomie and geniality of disposition, which is surely a passport to some extent amongst those who gain their living by the exercise of their fancy and imagination.

Had it not been my misfortune to be the possessor of a considerable independence, it is possible I might have made some figure in the world in one of the walks of art it has been the delight of my life to watch and be associated with.

After this slight hint at my tastes and proclivities it will not be considered a very extraordinary thing that in the early spring of 18— I should have found myself in Rome. I had been during the winter revelling for about the twentieth time in all the glorious and picturesque antiquities of the Eternal City, and my migratory disposition had given sundry warnings that I might soon spread my wings, and travel, more or less slowly, northwards. Indeed, warm weather was beginning to set in, and the nights were frequently becoming truly Italian, and the last I had intended to spend in my present locality proved to be one of the most lovely we had had that year.

I had been making some small preparatory arrangements for my departure on the morrow; I had also made a slight change in my attire for the sake of coolness, for although nearly nine o'clock, and early in the month of April, it was yet quite sultry. I was enjoying to the utmost a cigar at my open window, overlooking the Piazza del Popolo, and listening to the hum and stir of life around, with the cool, silvery trickling of the fountains rising above all, when my mind went back to past ages, to a time when the only shows which could divert a Roman populace were the deadly struggles for life between Roman heroes; and I thought of the mighty ruins of Coliseum, and how grandly the moon, then rising, would light up its soaring arches.

Acting as usual, upon impulse, I determined on the instant to stroll off and pay a parting visit to them under so favorable an aspect. So, putting on my hat, I descended the staircase of the palatial abode in which my apartments were; and after threading the narrow streets of the modern city, I found myself in the Via Alessandria; on leaving which my way lay through a green lane, where relics of the past, half buried under the turf on either side, met me at every step, and which made me think how often, perhaps, along the path I was even now treading, had rushed the Roman multitude, eagerly pressing forward to enjoy their "butcher's" holiday! But the image of imperial Rome in all her pomp vanished away when, having reached the termination of the lane, the ruins in their full beauty rose before me, and I found myself in a few moments standing alone in the vast arena of the Coliseum.

It is not my purpose, nor does the adventure I am about to relate require that I should attempt to describe a scene so familiar to all visitors to Rome. Viewed under the circumstances in which it was then presented to me, it is one of the grandest sights which the city affords, and one which has been most ably described in many works of history and fiction.

It seemed to me that I was the sole occupant of the place, which, but for the fact that the Roman season was near its close, would probably not have been the case, as the full moon would have been sure to attract groups of tourists to the spot. I wandered about in a dreamy kind of mood for some time and I then seated myself in a niche of shadow, as I might have done in a painter's studio, the more fully to enjoy the burst of light which fell upon the picture before me.

I can hardly say how long I remained there, nor whither my thoughts had led me, as I sat contemplating the beauty of the scene, and noticing with what tenderness the moon shed her kind rays alike over the divers symbols of Christian and Pagan faith which lay mingled together around me, when I became conscious of approaching footsteps breaking upon the peaceful stillness, which had hitherto remained undisturbed, save by the occasional humming of the night insects. Looking in the direction from whence the sound came, I saw emerging from the shade of one of the opposite arches a tall, dark figure. At first I could hardly discern whether it was that of a man or of a woman; but, on its drawing nearer, and coming into one of the broadest patches of moonlight, I discovered it was a sacristan or lay brother belonging to one of the monastic orders. His head was enveloped in his cowl, and for a minute or two I could but observe, with a painter's eye, of what great advantage, pictorially speaking, this dark figure was to the scene. As I have before hinted, although thoroughly accustomed to foreign travel, I had never quite got rid of the natural suspicion invariably entertained by all Englishmen towards strangers of every degree. I was perhaps scarcely conscious of the direct working of this feeling; but probably to it is to be attributed the impulse which instantly induced me to show myself; and, coming out from the obscurity of the shadow, I passed slowly within speaking distance of him, and we mutually acknowledged each other's presence by a "Buona notte, Signor." Soon after we again met, and he made some commonplace observation upon the beauty of the night, to which I responded, and in a few minutes we were civilly chatting together.

I speedily found from his conversation, and his remarks upon the ruins of the place, that he was a man whose education was very superior to that generally possessed by those occupying the position in life indicated by his dress and appearance. We conversed long, and, finally with enthusiasm—a discussion having arisen as to the time in which the gladiatorial combats were given up. My companion maintained that a close was put to them by the Emperor Honorius, towards the end of the fourth century. On the other hand, I contended that they had ceased under Constantine, more than fifty years earlier, and quoted, as I deemed correctly, several contemporary authorities in support of my opinion. Again he declared that Muratori, the most eminent of all Italian annalists, had fixed the date in the last year of the reign of Honorius, A. D. 423.

"If that be the case," I replied, "then you are right, most undoubtedly, and I am wrong; but I cannot help thinking that you are mistaken in saying that Muratori has made this statement."

"O yes, I can soon convince you of that fact, for it is only this evening that I met with the passage. Moreover, singularly enough, I have the volume with me, and," he continued drawing forth a small book from the pocket of his robe, "I believe the light is strong enough for you to read for yourself that which I assert to be the case: see here." He went on, turning over a page, "If we sit on this column we shall have the light of the moon at right angles with our leaf."

Saying this, he sat down in the place he indicated. In my excitement—for I was most enthusiastic in all such matters—I leaned or crouched down close over him, the better to see the words. Sure enough, it was as he stated, for the moonlight was so powerful that I could plainly read the passage to which he had alluded.

I remembered afterwards that he held the book in his left hand, whilst I bent over him from the other side, and thus his right hand was left free, and close to my side. A few words passed, and at last I was fain to admit that he had had the best of the argument. He rose rather abruptly, and good-humoredly added that, having convinced me of my mistake, he must wish me good night; and with a courteous, yet somewhat hurried salutation, passed on, saying he supposed I was not yet inclined to return home. I had given no cause for him to imagine this, and it struck me as strange that, after our friendly conversation, he should apparently so suddenly wish to get rid of my company.

His departing footsteps were still echoing through the ruins when I thought possibly it was time to be turning homewards. Instinctively I put my hand to my waistcoat-pocket, with the intention of looking at the hour, when lo! my watch was gone! "By Jove!" I exclaimed, "that scoundrel must have been a pickpocket, and this a new disguise and dodge for easing the tourist of his superfluous property!" Straight upon the impulse after him I flew. I could yet hear his quickening footsteps in the distance. Very soon I had him in sight, and in two minutes more by the throat, half-choking him, as I said: "You thief, you have stolen my watch!" He protested, as well as he was able, that he had done nothing of the kind, and remonstrated with me against my violence. I took no heed of this, but instantly commenced turning his pockets inside out; and sure enough in another instant I had abstracted from the breast of his cassock the missing treasure. Yes, there it was, palpably enough, my own, large, old-fashioned silver repeater, without chain, ribbon, or any appendages, carried loose in the pocket as was my custom. Half-shaking the life out of him, I poured forth a whole volley of abuse, telling him he might think it exceedingly fortunate that I did not at once march him off to the authorities; for remembering I was to leave Rome the next morning, I thought it better to inflict a little personal chastisement than to delay my departure to an unknown extent, by seeking the assistance of a court of justice. The fellow vainly attempted to cry for aid, but my grip was so strong upon him that he, being a rather elderly and wheezy man, could only give vent to a few groaning and squeaking ejaculations. With one final outburst of wrath I flung him headlong upon the ground. Boiling with rage and indignation, I strode away at a rapid pace in the direction of the city.

All is quiet as I regain the streets, and the French sentries at the different points of guard are the only people astir. I reach my hotel, congratulating myself upon the presence of mind I have displayed, and the courage and off-hand manner by which I have recovered my property, and inflicted speedy justice on the criminal. I ascend the staircase to my apartments, now in complete darkness. I enter in rather a perturbed state; I am some little time before I can manage to find the matches; at last I lay my hand upon the box containing them, I strike a light, and as it blazes into a flame, and lights up the room, the first thing it shows me, to my consternation, is my watch lying upon the table!

The conflicting feelings that then rushed into my mind can be easily imagined. Here was I, nothing short of a highwayman, having robbed and most unmercifully beaten a civil and unoffending man. There was his property sure enough in my possession; the two watches stared me in the face—not much alike on comparison, except in size, and that they were both silver, and with the strange coincidence that they had no appendages of any kind. I had been guilty of the very crime against the very person whom I had just accused of committing the same outrage upon myself! What was to be done? Of course I could easily explain the mistake, and make the poor fellow ample compensation for the wrong I had done him: but in the meantime I might be apprehended, as it were, red-handed. Worse than this, I had made my arrangements to depart by six the next morning, and my place was already booked in the diligence for Civita Vecchia.

I dare not go, for if I were discovered apparently taking flight, it would be no easy matter, to prove that my escape was not intentional. Further, what was I to do with the stolen property? All these contingencies went with a whirl through my brain. The plain truth of course was that when I had changed my dress just before going out, I had simply omitted to replace my watch in the fresh waistcoat I had put on, and the sudden departure of the sacristan after our argument, which I had remarked with suspicion, was merely accidental. There was but one thing for it, my departure must be deferred; and as soon as daylight would permit, I must go to our consul and place the stolen property, together with an explanation of the circumstances, in his hands. This of course I did, and the matter was eventually made straight by an ample bonus and apology to my poor victim. The consequences to myself entailed nothing more serious than the postponement of my journey for a few days. This was counterbalanced possibly by the lesson learned of the folly of giving way to undue impetuosity, and the injustice of the suspicion which my countrymen are too ready to attach to all people whom they do not know, especially foreigners, which gives rise to a great many of the mistakes made by other nations in their estimate of English character.

THEOLOGICAL VIEW OF NEGRO TESTIMONY.—A very bold and telling speech in behalf of the right of negroes to testify in the Courts was recently made in the Tennessee Legislature by Mr. Richards, who said, in the course of his argument: "Why, Mr. Speaker, to touch very cautiously upon the domain of theology, in which I am but little versed, is it not a fact that the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and other religious denominations of the South have professed for years to have Christianized multitudes of the negroes, and made them fit for heaven? And will these good people have us believe that a man may be a good Methodist or Baptist, and yet not fit to be believed on oath? That he may be worthy to take the sacrament, and unworthy to stand in the witness-box? That he may sing before the Almighty as a saint in glory, but cannot go before a Justice of the Peace to swear to an account of five dollars for work which he has done in the workshop or cotton field? If that be religion? Mr. Speaker, and these the principles on which it is based, I think the less we have of it the better for public morality."

CONFIRMATION.—Dr. Parr was not very delicate in the choice of his expressions, when heated by argument or contradiction. He once called a clergyman a fool, who, indeed, was little better. The clergyman said he would complain of this usage to the bishop. "Do," said the doctor, "and my lord bishop will confirm you."

GOSSIP ABOUT DRESS.

A CORRESPONDENT writing from Paris says that fancy dress balls have been in a style of unusual magnificence this winter, and the costumes which have graced them have been of the greatest splendor. Another grand fancy dress ball, to take place within a short time, will give work to scores of costomers, dressmakers, and sewing-girls. The following hints from a description of costumes worn at a recent Parisian masquerade, may be found useful in suggestions to our fair readers:

A beautiful dark-eyed and dark-haired belle, well known in Parisian circles, undertook to embody the character of Algeria—a spot of peculiar attractions for some time past to the French. The dress worn by the ambitious lady who desired to become synonomous with the country called on the map, Algiers, may be thus described: Six skirts of white gauze, streaked with gold, worn one above the other; and all opening at the right side over a satin petticoat of the new and exquisite shade of blue which derives its name from the waters of the Mediterranean Sea. The petticoat, as much of it as could be observed, and, probably, the whole of it was embroidered in gold to represent tiny slips. A scarf of the French colors (which are also those of our own fair land) red, white, and blue, was worn across the skirt and loosely but securely tied at the left side. The bodice was of blue satin in one mass of embroidery representing Arabic gold coins, and from the waist-band was suspended a small silver zataghan. The hair was arranged in thick and luxuriant tresses and intertwined with gold cord, and a wreath of flowers, to be found only in Algeria, crowned the brow. Upon entering the room a burnous of white gauze, striped with gold, exactly corresponding with the skirt, was worn, lightly thrown over the shoulders, and, in the course of the evening, laid aside entirely.

The following dress, representative of a humming-bird, will be found extremely beautiful. A skirt of short emerald green satin is covered thickly with humming-birds embroidered in gold and other brilliant colors, the throats and wings being formed from real feathers taken from these gorgeous little birds themselves. The effect of this ingenious arrangement is, at a short distance, that of a flight of humming-birds stopped midway in their flight and having alighted on an emerald greensward. The bodice looks as though it were fastened with humming-birds of almost microscopic dimensions, so minute are their proportions. These birds are represented, not in feathers, but in brilliant metallic substances, which seemingly change color with every position they are placed in. The bodice is made of ruby velvet, embroidered with white bugle beads, and the head-dress consists of three small humming-birds alighting amid the curls.

For ordinary ball-dresses, the following is one of the most beautiful that has been worn during the season. A dress of pale, rose-colored tulle over a slip of white satin; the hair, waving and curling in all the exquisite curves of naturally-waving hair, looking like burnished gold, and dressed with pink and pearl bandelets. On the neck of the fair wearer, gleamed a necklace of fine, pale orient pearls, and on the arms bracelets to correspond.

The dresses for out-door wear remain the same with very little difference—indeed, the difference consists only in the trimming, and occasionally a slight alteration in the sleeve or the bodice, such as an epaulette plain or an epaulette slashed, on a bodice with points, or a bodice round and with a belt. A new style of trimming, in velvet, has taken the place of the Vandyked bands formerly such great favorites. These are cut out at the top in squares like battlements, and each square is more plainly represented by a silk cord trimming around it. Balmoral skirts are trimmed in the same style; but the velvet band should nor match the skirt in color. It should be always of some strangely contrasting shade.

The spring and summer bonnet—there is no longer a doubt of it—is destined to be "The Gipsy." Whether it will "take" and become "the rage," only the summer can prove; but, for our part, we have no hesitation in declaring boldly that we hope it may, for it is extremely pretty, girlish, and, to young faces especially, becoming. Of course, it is not the large gipsy of the days of our great-grandmothers. No! this is a dainty miniature bonnet (or hat, more properly,) of precisely the same shape, but not more than one-third the size of the old-time gipsy. Success attend it!

AN old Methodist, very great at responses, which were not always appropriate, but always well-meant, went to hear a popular preacher. The parson, usually lucid, was rather perplexed, and felt it himself. He labored through the first part, and then said: "Brethren, I have reached the conclusion of my first point." "Thank God!" ejaculated the old man, who sat before him, profoundly interested, in a voice that was heard in every part of the old church. The last part of that sermon was harder to preach than the first.

A WAG, speaking of the cruel treatment of a child by its mother, says: "The child should certainly have the careful attention of some one, or it will be prematurely added to the kingdom of heaven, and thus, perhaps, permanently separated from its kindred."

UNDER THE ROSE.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALPHONSE KARR.

YOUR yellow rose is the souvenir of a curious history. It was my habit to visit, some two years since, an elderly lady residing in my neighborhood, whom I admired for her esprit, no less than for her amiable and benevolent disposition. She was passionately fond of flowers, and you would scarcely credit the pains I took in arranging the bouquets that I occasionally presented, or how delighted I was at her astonishment at receiving a flower that was rare to her, or of a variety not common in the country.

I met at her house, the other evening, an old gentleman who has lately taken possession of a very large property in the neigbborhood, which he had inherited from some distant relative, on condition that be should assume his name, and who, in consequence, is known as M. Descondraies.

He caused himself to be presented at my old friend's, and I might with reason be jealous of his delicate attentions. The acquaintance soon ripened into a mutual friendship, and they spent nearly all their evening together at tric-trac.

I saluted silently, without interrupting the game. When it was finished I offered Madame Lorgerel a bouquet of yellow roses, which I had brought for her.

My roses were very beautiful, which was not the case with the yellow roses of that year, the frequent rains having seriously interfered with their floresceuce. Mine, however, being protected by an overhanging roof, were, perhaps, the only ones that were well opened. Madame Lorgerel exclaimed with delight at the sight of the bouquet.

My flowers elicited no remark from M. Descondraies, who was apparently absorbed in reflection. I was at a loss to account for their mysterious influence upon him; but presently Madame Lorgerel engaged his attention by some remark, which diverted miue from the circumstance. After a moment's silence, he remarked:

You do not know that this bouquet recalls, as if by magical process, an epoch of my life that relates entirely to my youth. Within five minutes I am twenty years of age! within five minutes I am again in love with a woman who should be sixty years old, if, indeed, she still lives. I must relate to yon this history; it is a circumstance that bas exerted upon my whole life a great influence, and of which the sonvenir, even at this day, when my blood bas scarcely heat enough to ucurish my life, and to enable me to play at tric-trac, affects me to an extraordinary degree.

I was twenty (it is now more than forty years ago,) and had just left college, where they used to keep young men longer than they do now-a-days. After having sagely chosen for me, without my concurrence, a profession, my father one morning announced to me that he had obtained my appointment as lieutenant in the regiment of * * * in garrison in the city of Auverge, and bade me hold myself in readiness to leave in three days.

I was somewhat taken aback by this for several reasons: In the first place I had no taste for military life, though that was, in sooth, an easily overcome objection; the sight of a rich uniform, a few exciting phrases, and a little martial music would soon have made me an Achilles or a Cæsar as they preferred.

But I was in love.

Not for the world would I have thought of hinting a word of this to my father; his only reply would have been an order to depart that very evening. But I had an uncle—and such an uncle!

He was a man of about the same age as I am now, but he remained young in spirit; not selfish, for no old man ever renounced with a better grace, the pomps and vanities of Satan but for the sake of others. He loved the young; he understood them without being envious of them. He did not consider his infirmities as advancements, nor old age necessarily wisdom; but by dint of good sense and good nature, he lived for the happiness of others. He mingled in all the generous follies, in all the noble weaknesses of youth; he was the confidant and protector of all their loves, of all their debts, of all their hopes. I sought him then, and said to him, "I am very unhappy, uncle."

"I will wager twenty louis you are not," replied he.

"Ah! uncle, don't jest. Besides, you would lose."

"If I do, I shall pay: perhaps that will help to console you."

"No, my uncle, there is no question of money in my trouble."

"Let me hear it, then."

"My father has just announced to me that I am a lieutenant in the regiment ——"

"A great misfortune, truly. One of the most gallant uniforms, and all the officers gentlemen."

"But, my dear sir, I don't wish to be soldier."

"How? You don't want to be a soldier? Do you happen not to be brave, eh?"

"I don't know that, as yet: however, I shouldn't permit any one but you to ask such a question."

"Well, then, Cid, my friend, why don't you want to be a soldier?"

"Because I want to get married, uncle."

"W-h-e-w!"

"There is no whew about it, uncle; I am in love."

"And you call that a misfortune, you ungrateful fellow? I wish it was I that was in love, I assure you. And who is the object of so chaste a flame?"

"Ah! uncle, she's an angel."

"By-and-bye, you'll prefer a woman. However, what is this angel's name?"

"She is called Noemi."

"That is not what I asked you. For you Noemi is all in all. To be sure, it's a pretty name; but for me, who want to know who the angel is, and to what family she belongs, her family name is necessary."

"She is Mademoiselle Amelot, uncle."

"The devil! that is better than an angel; a graceful, tall, brunette, with eyes like black velvet. I do not disapprove of the choice."

"Oh! if I could only appreciate her soul—"

"I know; I understand. And you are repaid by a return, as we used to say in my time. Is that the way you express it now?"

"Indeed, uncle, I don't know."

"How! you don't know, unworthy nephew? You are every day at home in her house, and you don't know yet whether she loves you?"

"She does not even know that I love her, uncle."

"Oh, indeed! You deceive yourself there, my fine fellow, and you prove your inexperience in these matters. She knew it at least a quarter of an hour before you knew it yourself."

"My dear uncle! all that I know is, that I shall kill myself if I do not obtain her hand."

"Oh! Ah! Very well, my brave fellow, there are many chances that your wish will not be gratified. Your father is much more wealthy than hers, and I very much doubt whether he will give her his son."

"Then, uncle, I know what I shall do."

"Indeed? What is it? Do nothing stupid at least, and listen to your uncle."

"Yes, sir."

"In the first place, it is impossible for you to marry at twenty."

"Why so, sir?"

"Because I do not choose to let you, and without me this marriage cannot take place."

"Oh! my dear, kind uncle—"

"If the girl loves you, and if she will promise to wait for you three years—"

"Three years, uncle!"

"Do not argue the question, or I shall make it four. If she agrees to wait for you three years, you shall join your regiment."

"But, uncle—"

"But not at Clermont. I will have you exchanged into a regiment quartered at a short distance from Paris, so that you can visit her at least once in every three months until your probation has expired."

"It must be as you please, uncle; but how shall I know whether she loves me?"

"How shall you know, sir? Zounds! By asking her."

"Oh, sir, I shall never dare—"

"Then take leave of your father, and pack your trunk."

"But, sir, you do not know this girl; I have tried a hundred times to tell her that I loved her—I have despised myself for my timidity—I have thought of a hundred devices—I have learned fine speeches by heart—I have written letters, but hang it, at the critical moment, I have felt as if the first word was strangling me, and I have dodged the question. Her expression is so sweet, and at the same time so chaste, that it seems to me incapable of an earthly passion. As for the letters, they were even more difficult. At the moment of presenting them, they appeared to me so insufferably stupid that I could not tear them in sufficiently small pieces."

"At all events, you must end this matter, my boy. Your father has not told you all; if he sends you to Clermont, it is because the colonel of your regiment is his particular friend, and has an only daughter; it is a rich and honorable match."

"But—"

"I know very well what you are about to say; that all this is nothing in the present case. To be sure, love is a great piece of stupidity, that I should be sorry never to have committed. I know very well that old men call these matters illusions, but who can say that the illusion is not in their own minds? The glass that diminishes an object, is not more faithful than that which magnifies it.

"If she loves you, it is your duty to sacrifice everything for her—it may be thought foolish, but it is right, and you must do it; but you ought to know her sentiments, and the occasion is fortunate to elicit them. You have a rival in this affair, my nephew; you are pale at this idea; would you like to measure the distance between you and him with your sword? Very well; try to display a little of this courage in the presence of the beautiful Noemi. Her friends wish to marry her. You are richer than she, but your rival is richer than you; moreover, he has a title, and still more, he is a husband to her hand, and the corbeille is all ready, whereas you will occasion some delay. Go and see Noemi—tell her that you love her; she is aware of it: at all events, it is well to do it; ask her, if she returns your affection, to wait for you three years, and to write me a letter to that effect which I will keep; and then I will break off the other match; I will procure you a commission in another regiment, and in three years, in spite of your father, in spite of everything, I will then marry you to Noemi."

"Uncle, I have an idea."

"What is it?"

"I will write to her."

"As you please."

I left my uncle, and set about my epistle. There was no difficulty in that, for I had already written fifty letters; it was the delivery of the letter that embarrassed me. But as there was no help for it, I bought a bouquet of yellow roses, and slipped the billet into the centre of the bouquet. It was, perhaps, a very silly note, but I remember it to this day. After the avowal of my love, I besought her to return my affection and to be faithful to me for three years. I begged her, in token of her consent to this, to wear one of my yellow roses in her bosom; then, continued I, "I shall dare to speak with you with regard to my—may I not say our mutual happiness?"

"Ah! so you placed the note within the bouquet?" said M'me Lorgerel.

"I did, Madame."

"Well! and afterwards?"

"Alas! Noemi wore no rose in her bosom that night! I wished to kill myself; but my uncle carried me off in spite of myself to Clermont, ingratiated himself with the young officers, and succeeded at length in consoling me, and convincing me that Noemi never loved me."

"And yet, uncle," exclaimed I, "she seemed always so glad to see me; she reproached me so tenderly when I came late."

"Ah! the women accept the love of every one, but it is not every one they love in return."

"So I finally succeeded in nearly forgetting her, and married the colonel's daughter, whom I lost after eight years of marriage. I am, therefore, alone in the world now, for my uncle is long dead; yet, would you believe it? I still sometimes think of Noemi, and the wonder is, that I always seem to see her chestnut curls, and, as my uncle said, her eyes, while in truth she must be a somewhat aged dame by this time."

"Then, you do not know what has become of her?"

"Not in the least."

"Ah! your real name is not Descondraies, then?"

"No: it is the name of my uncle's estate; my name is Edmund d'Altheim."

"Can it be true?"

"How can you doubt it?"

"I can tell you the fate of Noemi."

"What say you?"

"I say that she loved you."

"But the yellow rose?"

"She never saw the billet. Your sudden departure grieved her deeply. Finally she espoused M. de Lorgerel."

"M. de Lorgerel?"

"M. de Lorgerel, whose widow I now am."

"What! you? are you Noemi Amelot?"

"Alas! yes; as you are, or rather as you no longer are, Edmund d'Altheim."

"Just Heaven! who would have believed that the day could arrive when we no longer should recognize each other?"

"Is it not strange—and that we should only meet again to play tric-trac?"

"But the bouquet—"

"I have still kept in my possession."

Madame Lorgerel tremulously opened an ebony box, and drew out a faded bouquet.

"Untie it, untie it!" cried M. Descondraies.

In the centre of the bouquet was found the billet, which had remained there forty-two years.

Both were silent. I rose to leave; M. Descondraies also rose.

Madame Lorgerel seized his hands and said to him: "You are right; the passions of youth scarcely become faces scarred like ours with age. Let not our noble sentiment, which, perchance, will give happiness to the rest of our lives, be a subject of ridicule. Do not return for a few days."

Since this time the aged couple are constantly together. There exists between them an attachment that I have scarce seen equaled. They renew together the details of this love which was never confessed. They have a thousand things to tell each other. Their love is retrospective, and they would still marry, but they dare not.

"If I am not at home from the party to-night at ten o'clock," said a husband to his better and bigger half, "don't wait for me." "That I won't," replied the lady, significantly; "I won't wait, but I'll come for you." The gentleman returned at ten o'clock, precisely.

MR. HAWTHORNE'S DIARY.

A BOSTON magazine is publishing extracts from the private diary of a writer whose finished works have given delight to thousands, and have gained undying honor for American literature. The diary was evidently made for the writer's own eye alone. No thought of its publication, probably, ever entered his mind. It consists of records of his walks, observations, passing thoughts, and suggestions for matnrer literary labor. We conceive that in their puhlication an outrage has been committed upon the memory of the gifted and lamented Hawthorne. Many of our prominent authors have wished that they might deny the paternity of their earlier works which bear the marks of youth and erudity. Others have lessened their fame by the publication, while they were in the height of their reputation, of efforts which were made in earlier years; but there are few, we fancy, who would not shudder with horror at the thought that after their death their private memoranda and familiar jottings should be hurried into print and spread abroad among their previous admirers and before unfriendly critics.

An author who writes as Hawthorne wrote sends his productions before the world only after careful and patient elaboration. Having gained a reputation, he has no wish to peril it by hasty and inconsiderate publication. What an injustice, then, to drag before the public the unwrought material and the private records which were meant only for the eye of the author! It is as if the slight sketches and unfinished studies of an artist were paraded in the exhibitions after his death, hung before a gazing crowd and labelled with the name of oue who had gained distinguished triumphs in art. Such a proceeding shocks our feelings. We havc no desire to see thrust before the public the chips from tne sculptor's chisel, the stray markings of the painter's brush, or the unfinished waifs of the author's pcn. It is far more pleasing and far more just to enjoy again their great works by which they gained their laurels.

And we have no right thus to pry into the journal of the departed romancist. The works which he wished to be given to the world, he himself gave. On those he lavished the wealth of his rich genius and exquisite imagination. On those he wished his fame to rest; through those he wished to be judged by cotemporaries and posterity. Is not the wish reasonable? Has not the author a right to demand that his merits be judged hy the works whieh he has elaborated, ou which he has spent his best years. and which he has chosen to offer for the criticism aud decision of the public? Or is it right to rummage the dead author's desk and publish a selection, not the author's, of passages from the scrap-books aud notebooks whieh he has left hehind him?

The reason of the publication of this diary may be found, probably, in the desire of the magazine publishers to keep upon their list of coutrihutors the name of one so widely known and so worthily honored. But we submit that it is no right of publishers thus to parade in their issues the private notes and personal records of the authors whose elaborate works have gained them renown. If such a course is to be encouraged and pursued, we shall have next the publication of a deceased writer's expense-hooks and the records of his personal disbursements. No author who has achieved any prominence, and who wishes to preserve his fame undimmed, will dare to leave, or even to keep, any record of his stray thoughts or unfinished efforts, with the fear and the prospect hanging over him that whatever he puts upon paper will be rushed into print after his death.

There is a growing disposition to pry curiously into the private ways and personal habits of illustrious authors and promiuent public men which deserves severe censure. What the author presents for the world's judgment, we have a right to try by the sternest standards of impartial criticism; but beyond this we have no right to go. The public actions and declared opinions of the statesman are fair subjects for thorough examination and free discussion; but with his private and domestic life the public have no right to meddle.

Of the passages which have thus far heen printed from Hawthorne's notebooks some will please and some disappoint us. But, as the author never presented them to the public for its judgment, we do not make them the subjects of our criticism. We have seen their publication with unfeigned sorrow, and we enter our protest against it.—Round Table.

A QUAINT CONCEIT.—Charles Lamb's humor was at times almost too fine for his company; and some of his comically extravagant declarations at times were accepted gravely by those who should have known him better. On mere strangers and acquaintances whom he did not care to set right as to his true opinions, social puritans and pedants whom, perhaps, he delighted in "shocking a little," it was natural that unfavorable impressions should be left. Thus, in a circle where his biographer was present, and where the infamous witnesses on the Queen's Trial were being discussed, Lamb said gravely that "he should like to know them—to ask them to supper." "You would not sit with them?" asked Talfourd, solemnly—a question that brought out the smart answer: "Yes, I would sit with anything but a heu or a tailor."

HEAD DRESSES AND HAIR DRESSING.

HUMMING-BIRDS have been so popular for trimming bonnets, hats, head and ball dresses, during the last four years, that it is now to be feared that the race is becoming extinct, and that the demand for them is greater than the supply. The ever inventive French artificial florists have come to the rescue, by introducing what are called "metallic humming-birds and butterflies." These are apparently made of foil papers of the most dazzling, brilliant colors, and they positively glisten with light, the hues changing according to the position the little bird may be placed in. Not very many of these metallic imitations of the most exquisite among the feathered tribe have been made, therefore it is probable that some time will elapse before the English market is supplied.

The head dresses worn during the day differ essentially from those intended for evening wear. While the former are simple in character, it seems impossible to arrange the hair too fantastically and too elaborately for full dress. The small rolled bandeaux ealled béliers are now abandoned, which is a pity, as they were easy to arrange, and the hair thus dressed proved generally a very becoming style. They are now replaced by short frizzed curls, which necessitate either the wearing of false hair, or the cutting of the front hair short, and neither of these alterations is agreeable. What is styled the "Metternich" head dress is one of the most simple arrangements now recognized. The hair is waved in front, and a small bandeau is worn low on the forehead; a second bandeau is then turned from the temples; a bandelet of velvet, with a small bow either in the front or at the side, is then tied round the head, and a third bandeau of hair is rolled forward to meet it; at the back of the head there is a large chignon of ringlets.

Head dresses affect more and more the antique style. The great novelty is called the Pompeian bandeau. It is composed with one or two rows of gold beads, which are placed forward on the forehead, passed behind the ear, and allowed to fall forward on the chest, forming thereby a sort of necklace. Thcse Pompeian bandeaux are also made of gold chains, of small squares of chased silver, and of cameos. I have seen some very rich ones made of diamonds and pearls, and of pearls and emeralds. The character of this bandeau is to be the same width in the centre as it is at the side of the head. As it is worn very forward on the head, it is with difficulty that the small ringlets can be so arranged as to play on the forehead. It is a becoming head dress to those who have regular classical features; and the neeklace, which falls behind the ear, is likewise becoming to those who have thin throats. All head dresses, even if they are made of flowers, are worn very forward on the head; the only exeeption to this rule is the Cleopatra head dress, which consists of a coronet of plaits placed one above the other, and the smallest of curls issuing from the plaits; it is an almost universally becoming arrangement of the hair.

Iu the evening veritable wreaths and coronets of frizzed curls are worn, and these are enlivened with flowers imitated either in diamonds or cnamel or filigreed work. For the back, the chignons, composed of hows of hair, are replaced by a row of thick curls, which are wound round the finger, the end being concealed and pinned up. Formerly these curls were called boudins, and they are now arranged one after the other in regular rotation at the back of the head, looking rather stiff and inelegant, but they are found to be a convenient arrangement for damp weather. The Belle Hélene chignon is preferred by those ladies who have fair light hair; it is composed of light ringlets, which fall uniformly round the throat, and are fastened at the top by means of a comb with a straight top. Both steel and jewelled combs are very popular; the ornamental tops are about one inch and a half wide, and are always straight. Those who can afford it purchase combs with gold tops, studded with precious stones; the more modest purses content themselves with either cameos, pearls, or enamel, all of which produee an exceedingly pretty effect at candlelight. Very young girls alone wear flowers in their hair, arranging them as round flat wreaths. Such flowers as pinks, daisies, mignonette, corn-flowers, etc., are used for the purpose. Sometimes two sprays of different flowers are tressed together; the forget-me-not and elematis answer for this, and look very pretty so arranged.

GOOD-BREEDING.—Good-breeding and refinement, or rather the externals of these qualities, are generally considered as wholly precluding those vulgar manifestations of ill-temper, rudeness, impertinence, and similar feelings, which the unsophisticated display with such perfect frankness. But it does not thence follow that the well-bred and refined have not their little spites, little envious feelings, little assumptions of consequence to gratify; indeed, they do gratify them very freely; all the difference lies in the manner; for there is a finish, a delicacy of touch in the polite impertinence of the well-bred, which the under-bred may envy, but must never hope to attain. The slight that can be conveyed in a glance, in gracious smiles, in a wave of the hand, is often the ne plus ultra of art. What insult is so keen, or so keenly felt, as the polite insult, which it is impossible to resent?

A NEW RAPE OF THE LOCK.

PARISIAN hair-dressers affirm that the present fashion of loading the head with falsc hair must, ere long, be brought to an end by the impossibility of procuring the necessary supplies of hair. Already the difficulty of obtaining hair has brought certain enterprising "hair-hunters" (as they are technically termed) into trouhle, as has been shown by an incident that occurred a few days ago, on the Boulevard Montmartre, where a young girl was found by a policeman. weeping so bitterly as to excite the inquisitive pity of that functionary. Questioned by the guardian of public order as to the cause of her tears, the girl replied that she was an orphan, that both her parents had recently died of cholera, leaving her in the utmost poverty, and that having made the acquaintance of a certain D. he had offered to place her with his wife as a housemaid: that she had accepted this offer, and had gone with D. to his house, hut had seen nothing of his wife, who was, he said, gone into the country for a day or two; that D., on pretext that she might be hungry, had given her a piece of bread and a glass of wine, whieh latter had "got into her head" in a very strange way, and had caused her to become unconscious for an hour or two; that, on coming to herself, she found that her hair, which was jet black and very luxuriant, had been cut off while she had been asleep; and that D., on fiuding her awake, had ordered her to go away, telling her she had no business to be there, and had pushed her out into the street, telling her, in answer to her reproaches for the theft of her hair, that she was a drunken jade, and that he did not know what she was talking about. The policeman, having heard the girl's story, which she confirmed by taking off her cap and showing him that her hair was cut off close to the roots, gave information to his chiefs of the assault that D. had committed, and proceeded, with a couple of his brethren, to the house indicated by the girl. Through their investigations it was ascertained that D., who is a hair-dresser is also a dealer in hair, and that he has obtained large quantities of this article by freqnenting the public balls, making acquaintance with the women he meets there, and eontriving, by the offer of small sums of money, to induce them to sell him their locks. Latterly, the demand for hair increasing, and the supply falling off, this zealous caterer to the folly of the hour has adopted the violent mode of proceeding which has brought him into uncomfortable contact with the arm of the law. It seems that he has latterly heen in the habit of prowling about the lowest quarters of the capital, where he watches for any girls whose appearance betokens poverty and friendlessness, and having inveigled them to his lodgings, contrives, either by the offer of a trifling sum of money, or, if that is rejected, by violence, to possess himself of their hair. A great number of curious letters were found at D.'s lodgings. One of these billets ran thus:

"Monsieur, you are a scoundrel. You have stolen my hair, and left me to starve. You know well enough that, up to this hour, you have not paid me oue sou. ERNESTINE."

A certain countess writes as follows:

"Monsieur, you have not acted honestly. The hair you have sold me is doubly false, for it is dyed, and stains my neck. I warn you that, if you do not change it, I shall summon you before the tribunal for deception in regard to the quality of the goods you have sold to me."

Another correspondent addressed the hair embellisher in these words:

"Infamous brigand, you nearly strangled me while cutting off my hair by force, and you leave me without a farthing. If, by six o'clock this evening, you have not sent me two Napoleons, I will denounce your villainy to the police.
JUDITH."

The evidence against the too enterprising "hair-hunter" being deemed conclnsive, D. was sent to prison, where he now is, to await his trial.

A VERY curious lawsuit is now progressing in France, arising from some legacies left hy M. Couvreux to the servants of the hotel at which he was stopping at the time of his death. M. Couvreux, a gentleman of wealth and position, was a perfect monomaniac on the subject of guillotines, one of which he had fitted up in his room, and after experimenting on numbers of dogs and cats, he became convinced it was the only method by which a man could die without pain. Accordingly, one evening he tried the experiment on himself. It was most successful, and his head rolled pleasantly on the floor; but whether he suffered any pain or not is of course unknown. His relatives contest the will on the plea of insanity.

HENRY J. POTTER. of Bridgewater, Mass., has constructed a steam engine, which he has built for driving a watchmaker's lathe. This engine is seven-eighths inches bore, and one and three-eighths stroke, and has a horizontal cylinder. It has an oval boiler, thirteen inches greatest diameter by eight inches high, which is armed by two kerosene burners. The engine makes about 300 revolutions per minute, works with great ease, and is a desirable and practical thing for small purposes. It carries ten pounds of steam.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MARCH 31. 1866.

IS THE LEGISLATURE SO CORRUPT?

IF all the charges—or, indeed, one-half of them—brought against the present Legislature be true, it is one of the most corrupt and venal bodies that ever assembled to the disgrace of a State. In justice to itself, it should either purge itself at once and forever of the accusations publicly brought against it, or every member should resign and thus tacitly confess his guilt. In the first instance, in the case of the Daily American Flag newspaper, which charged that seven Senators had been suborned to vote against the repeal of the Specific Contract Law, the responsible editor was arrested and called upon to make the assertion good. Refusing to answer the questions propounded to him, and failing to substantiate his charges, he was committed to a prison from which he has but lately been released. But the voice of the Flag was but as a whisper, a word, compared with the ceaseless clamor which the Evening Bulletin has made and is making. Boldly and broadly, without a single qualification, it asserts that the Legislature is to all intents and purposes a den of thieves; that it is wholly under the control of the lobby; that there is no bill, however infamous or corrupt, the passage of which cannot be procured, if sufficient money be sent to Sacramento. In a recent issue it declares that "there is at the present time scarcely a man throughout the length and breadth of the State, who is not thoroughly convinced that what he terms the 'lobby,' were money enough sent to Sacramento, could pass a measure taxing the people of California, in violation of the Constitution, $10,000,000 annually for the next twenty years; if they could be made to pay such a sum."

If it be indeed true that our Legislature is so hoplessly venal, so morally corrupt, the journals which have made the onslaught upon it and trumpeted its villainy to the world, deserve credit and the thanks of the community for their manly and outspoken course. For the press is a watch-tower, and its sentinels should never prove recreant to the trust reposed in them by the public. But if it be untrue, if the charges so loudly and sweepingly made, and so broadly disseminated, are false, very few will deny that the utterers are deserving of severe punishment. For it is not a light thing to publish to the world that the legislators of a State are as merchantable as harlots, and quite as lost to shame. Dismissing all the platitudes by which the Bulletin thinks it necessary to prove that a member of the Legislature has no right to accept a bribe, and once establish the fact that members have, or even a general belief in that direction, and the result is scarcely one which can be favorable to the interests of the country. The immigration induced by such a state of things would probably be very similar to that population of which our city freed itself when it rose some years ago and took the law into its own hands, or rather made laws and executed sentences without consulting the statutes of the State. Whether the charge be true or not makes little difference so far as the outside world is concerned, for all will be apt to believe what is so persistently repeated, and never once refuted. Nor can we exactly see, in our present light, how the Senate, which took such indignant note of the charges made by the Flag, came to pass so lightly and unheedingly by the more damning accusations of the Bulletin. For the latter is in every respect the more powerful, influential, and wider circulated journal of the two. If the former damaged the reputation of the Legislature by its attacks, the latter has torn it to shreds at home and abroad, if there be anything in journalistic fury. Are the charges indeed true, or is the Legislature afraid to deal with an established journal as severely as with one that is not quite so firmly planted on its pins?

THE Dashaways give a concert and social party at their hall on Thursday evening next. An excellent time is promised—good artists, much dancing, and an abundance of lemonade and Napa soda. Everything goes and everybody should go—for the cause of Temperance sadly needs recruits.

GOOD TIMES COMING.

IF anything may be built upon present indications, the dull dark clouds that for some months past have been hanging over the prosperity of our State are well nigh dissipated. There has already been a decided advance in the market price of standard mining stock and a revival of business, and the promises of the future are bright. Reports from the interior state that "everything is green and growing"—it is delightful to think that occasionally things in the interior are growing as well as green—the air is filled with the balm of flowers, grain fields look well, an abundant harvest of fruit is expected, the hay crop is excellent, the mining season by the late bounteous rains will be prolonged until late in the summer—in short an era of prosperity to make amends for the late period of gloom may be counted upon with certainty. Gathering its lifeblood from the interior, our city may look to see its veins once more tingling with health and a reign of confidence in her resources established—which only an earthquake can shake. In view of the tide of wealth which is so soon to flow in upon us, but one caution is necessary to those of an enthusiastic turn of character—wait until it comes. It is the too common fault of our people to be forever discounting the future, counting their chickens before they are hatched, and in not infrequent instances killing by their injudicious eagerness the hen before the eggs are laid. All can afford to wait. There is no necessity for increasing personal expenses until the Pactolean current actually comes coursing among us, and we are ladling it into our pockets. Extravagance is the popular vice, and the spending of an inheritance before coming into its possession is an indiscretion to which the sanguine are specially subject. If a word to the wise is sufficient, two words to the foolish should be enough. To the latter—unfortunately we feel that we are addressing the great bulk of all populatious—we say wait until the harvest comes home to your doors before you go to market with it and spend the proceeds. With the upper rim of the good time, so long promised, just visible above the edge of the horizon at last, wait until it bursts upon us in all its glory before basking anticipatively in the full broadness of its golden beams. For it is never pleasant to be disappointed, and where much expectation is excited by promise, the performance is almost certain to disappoint.

TO VENTURE upon a criticism of San Francisco weather, is dangerous, indeed. To take up the failings of a favorite aunt, and speak in sceptical terms of her taste in caps and bonnet strings, condemning unqualifiedly her habit of scattering snuff around in the eyes of her acquaintances in taking her regular pinch, would not contribute in any material degree to the harmony of the family circle. It has been the fashion for years past for local reporters to climb Telegraph Hill to view the charming landscape, and write paragraphs comparing the heavens to "the skies of Italy." The "Bay of Naples" was especially favorite as a foil, and contrasts were instituted between that and our own Bay, which by no means turned wholly to the advantage of the former. Even the fog which came rolling in of afternoons was considered invigorating and healthy. But the day is already dawning when people exhibit a tendency to growl at and criticise the climate, and editors are getting tired of throwing bouquets and getting nothing but deluges of rain or sand in return. It was formerly the fashion to call attention to the legs of the rising generation, deducting from the amazing development of muscle which they exhibited conclusions which resolved themselves into positive compliments to our sand-hills. But since the idea of digging down the hills and carting them away has been acted upon, we hear persons expatiating upon the evils which result from the flying sand, causing the features of even the best-natured of the population to contort into a chronic frown, and making the majority of our beauties cross-eyed. On the whole, great as are the advantages of San Francisco in some respects, we apprehend that the less said about its climate the better. For strangers who come out here and fail to find the Italian skies, are very apt to think that they have been imposed upon, and grumble and growl; when, had nothing been promised them, they would contentedly resign themselves to "climatic influences."

THE New York Nation, a good and moral journal in the main, but fearfully behind the age in all that pertains to matters of living and vital interest, laughs at a correspondent of a New York journal for asserting that the Nation was wrong in speaking of the fervor of San Francisco suns—especially as nothing was said about the daughters. It calls the correspondent a "cockney," venturing as blindly in the dark in determining upon his nationality as it did in guessing about our climate. We are surprised that the Nation should so far forget its dignity as to "call names." It is better to be stupid than vituperative.

THE London Athenæum, saucily reviewing Mr. Barnum's new volume, The Humbugs of the World, by P. T. Barnum, Esq., finds fault with it for being personally so unrevealing, and says The Barnums of the World, by A Humbug, Esq., would be a fitter title for it, as it is not confined to humbugs in the strict sense of the term, and it is not by Barnum.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

OF all arts that of letter-writing is one of the most difficult—we might also add one of the most dangerous. A great many books have been printed to show how letters should be written, but as a general rule they serve an exactly contrary purpose—to show how they should not be. Letter-writing is sufficiently practiced on all sides to establish a high standard of excellence upon the principle that practice makes perfect, but unfortunately among lady correspondents there are very few Madame de Sevignés while, unfortunately for the credit of the other sex, it must be confessed that Horace Walpoles are almost equally rare among men. If anything in letter-writing may be learned from good models, James P. Holcombe, LL. D., has done the public a service in Literature in Letters, a compilation of selections from the correspondence of eminent persons. That eminent persons always write eminently good letters is by no means eminently true, but in the volume before us there is not one which would not do to pattern from.

In Letters of Life Mrs. Sigourney communicates to Mrs. Caroline Washburn her autobiography. It is as minute as though transcribed from the pages of a journal; interesting of course, but containing some details which, while they may have interest to near and dear friends, have little or none to the general public.

"The mob of gentlemen that write with ease," has been greatly swelled during the present century. It is to be lamented, perhaps, that rhyme is so easy, for it is not to be disputed that mediocre verse is less difficult to write than good prose. Against filling the columns of newspapers with verse no reasonable objection can be urged, for a certain amount of space is always open that may as well be occupied with lines that rhyme as with editorials and news items that do not, but really we do not think that G. H. Hollister will take rank among the poets of the day from the publication of Thomas à Becket, and Other Poems.

A biographical sketch entitled a Memoir of James L. Petigru, by Wm. J. Grayson, commends itself to the attention of all who are interested in the lives of representative men. As the reader will remember Mr. Petigru was a native of South Carolina, a leading member of Charleston society, and, to his praise be it spoken, he stood alone among his fellow citizens the open and consistent opponent of treason, resisting the subtle seductions of secession. The biography, the preface informs us, was written upon scraps of old paper, having been undertaken during the privations and anxieties of the siege of Charlestou when the materials for writing had become scarce. Within a few hours of its completion the author died, from the effects of a tedious illness, aggravated by patriotic regrets and personal bereavements.

Jean Ingelow, who has never yet written anything that detracted from her reputation, adds to it in Stories Told to a Child. It is such books as these that make one sorry that he cannot shake off from his shoulders the years that have accumulated there and be a child again—if only for one long winter night. They didn't print such books for us when we were children; in beauty of exterior as well as charm of contents the ones of the present day bear away the palm. The one before us is as handsome as an annual or any of the extra fine-featured books that used to come to us as birthday presents. And the stories are told with a simplicity which will commend them to youthful understandings. In talking to little fishes the authoress does not commit the too common error of using language only adapted for addressing great whales.

Mrs. Oliphant, in Agnes, gives us a novel in that peculiar, quiet style which has won for her more good critical notices than readers. She stands widely distinct from that school of lady romancists whereof Miss Braddon is chief and Mrs. Henry Wood second in command. Agnes is a subdued story of English life.

Under the attractive title of Coupon Bonds, we have an interesting little story in pamphlet form by J. T. Trowbridge, detailing the adventures which befell a few thousand dollars in government securities. Pilfered by a little fellow to cover his kite with—a new way of bringing about a rise in the funds—they were all found at last and contributed to bring happiness to the home of a returned volunteer.

John Greenleaf Whittier—the Quaker Poet! we always feel a quiet content on learning that he has a poem in the Atlantic, or has printed a new one in a book. Snow-Bound, a Winter Idyl, is one of the most charming productions of his pen. As a critic very truly remarks, it will for the future bear to American literature the same relation that "The Deserted Village" does to the English. It is said to be indeed a truthful reflection of phases of the poet's early life, and that the characters are real companions of his youth. A fine engraving of the author forms the vignette of the volume.

FROM Major Jack Stratman we have received a copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac and Repository of Useful Information; Special Edition for the Pacific Coast. A graphic—lithographic, at least—likeness of President Johnson prefaces the pamphlet, humorous pictures and anecdotes are abundant, while a really valuable collection of statistical, historical and other information, is furnished gratis—for, we take it, the Chief Magistrate's countenance ought of itself to be worth fifty cents.

THE GERMAN LOVE OF FLOWERS.

THE following extracts from a letter from Germany will give the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN some idea of the love and appreciation of flowers abroad, and perhaps afford some practical hints of which they may be able to take advantage. The writer says :

"One of the first things which attracts the attention of a stranger upon entering Germany is the universal love of flowers. Everywhere you see them, and often in the greatest profusion. In all the large towns, the flower-dealers and the flower-girls are established and well-patronized persons.

"Wherever you go you are sure to meet them, at the cars, on the steamboat, at the table d'hote, the concert, and the ball, in the streets, and in the reading-rooms. In the large cities, if there be a bit of vacant ground attached to a dwelling, it is converted into a flower-bed; however, as people seldom live in a house by themselves, but several families upon the various floors of the same building, all cannot even enjoy a miniature garden, and to make up for it you find the windows filled with beautiful flowers. I have seen large buildings in which every window had its floral screen. And way up in the attic windows, which look like loop-holes in the steep roof, you see carefully cherished plants and gracefully trained vines, their lively refreshing green contrasting very favorably with the red dusty tiles around them. And who knows what a blessing these flowers may be to some lone, wearied seamstress, who, year after year, sits at her lonely window, with nought for a prospect save the glaring sea of roofs around her; or to some poor invalid, who, month after month, longs in vain for the pure air and green fields of childhood's happy home.

"I remember one poor woman, whose rooms were so small that there was scarcely enough space to turn round in them, who showed me a collection of plants which would have graced any conservatory. The German gentlemen delight to wear flowers in their button-holes, and I used to meet, day after day, certain gentlemen who never failed to have some beautiful fresh flowers in their coats. Some seemed to show a preference for some particular flower; for you always saw this one with a rose and that one with a geranium, while others would wear little clusters of violets or lilies of the valley. The ladies, too, delight to adorn their hair with beautiful flowers, preferring, often, some single fair flower, to a profusion of glass beads or steel nonsense, and I have seen fairy-like exotic blossoms, strangely beautiful, deliciously fragrant, which formed more fitting ornaments for a brow of beauty than the rarest gems. No present is more acceptable than a beautiful bouquet, and upon one's birthday it is a customary gift.

"But the flowers are not always from the green-house or the garden. They are fond of wild flowers, and no German family ever returns from a rural ramble without an armful of them. They delight to gather beautiful grasses and ferns, interspersing them tastefully with flowers, to form immense bouquets. In the cities, where possible, they have gardens and arbors, where they love to linger, to read and to sing; or, perhaps, a spacious balcony covered with trailing vines will be scene of their tea parties. But, if these be wanting, the whole family will visit some large public concert or tea garden, and, securing a table under some spacious tree, will gather around it, and, looking up at the over-spreading branches above them, will forget the brick walls and paved thoroughfares which everywhere encircle them, while the tuneful orchestra, which ever and anon sends forth its clear strains of music, makes them forget for the while the petty cares and sorrows which pamper their existence. In the smaller towns, you find almost universally a garden connected with every house, and in this garden a never-failing arbor, where the family can take their meals. In a drive upon a pleasant afternoon in the environs of a large city, I have seen scores of families sitting out of doors drinking their afternoon coffee, some in gardens, some in lawns, and some on little plats of grass in front of their houses, just large enough to place their chairs and tables. The Germans are very fond of little family excursions into the country, both for their own pleasure and that of their children. If some pleasant spot is to be found within no very great distance, perhaps they will walk, taking with them a bounteous luncheon, and sitting around upon the green grass, under noble trees, they listen to the cheery warble of the birds, and drink in the pure air and sunshine, while the children romp and play, chasing butterflies and gathering flowers; and thus they pass a pleasant afternoon, until the evening shadows begin to gather round them, when they turn their steps homeward, all the better and happier for their communion with nature. If you wish to see the population of a German city, and every grade of it, you have only to visit some of their parks on a Sunday.

"Here you will see the prince and the peasant, the general and the private, the peer and the artisan, all together, all pursuing the same object, but still separated as by walls of iron. King and princes, knowing that their subjects are more contented when they are allowed such pleasures, have fitted up magnificent royal parks and gardens, and thrown them open to the public. In this manner the poor and middle classes, although able to do but little in this way themselves, become familiar with and grow into a love of horticulture. Their dwellings are often untasteful and unpretending, but they are made beautiful by their surroundings."

With such a climate as we have here, and the ease and facility with which plants are grown, why is it that there are not more evidences of this refined taste amongst us? It only needs a beginning, for, when once fairly inaugurated, it will spread its influence, and whole neighborhoods will change and become noted for their beauty. IRIS.

CRITICISM ON POETRY.

[FROM a department entitled "The Doctor's Club" in the New York Atlas, we make the following extract. The Doctor, with his club, strikes heavily at a style of criticism which is evidently not admired though fully appreciated by him.]

THE subject upon which I intend to gossip with you this evening, is Criticism on Poetry.

I am induced to take up this subject, first, because you are all poets, and will, therefore, understand me, and second, because I have just read in our Pacific exchanges some very sprightly criticisms on Outcroppings of California Verse, edited by Frank Bret Harte, well known as "The Condensed Novelist," and containing what purport to be selections from the best of the Californian poets.

Almost every editor in California being poetically inclined, Mr. Harte was compelled to overlook some of them in making up his little volume, which rather injudicious act brought about that worthy gentleman's ears such a hornet's nest as never before was let loose upon anybody.

No sooner did the book make its appearance than the slighted editorial poets set up a howling and snarling worthy of a pack of hounds on the trail of their victim.

The editor of the book being also the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN, is charged with showing partiality to those connected with that journal, particularly to C. H. Webb, alias Iuigo, five of whose poems he gives to one or two from other writers, whom the dissatisfied claim to be much better representatives of the muse.

To give you an idea of the way poetical editors criticize the works of their brother poets, allow me to read you the following from one of the "slighted" ones on C. H. Webb's poems. From it you will learn how easy it is to find something to growl about when you are disposed to growl :

"With head uncovered we now approach that portion of the volume devoted to the productions of C. H. Webb—one of the editors of THE CALIFORNIAN. He is liberally patronized. Five of his pieces are given—the largest number selected from the Outcroppings of any one of Mr. Harte's poets. Why Mr. Webb is thus profusely honored we are not informed. No reason for it is discernible in the selections. A bungling dentist in San Francisco once pulled six teeth from the mouth of a suffering applicant in the attempt to find the diseased grinder. Mr. Harte probably found himself in a like dilemma in attempting to operate upon the poems of Mr. Webb. He extracted wildly in the hope of finally getting hold of the right tooth, but the molar remains. Frankly speaking, Mr. Webb's poems are trash—the very trashiest of the trash constituting the staple of Outcroppings. They remind us of a medley song thrown together by a melodious poet—full of familiar sounds in comical incongruity. They are weak paraphrases of 'Old Dog Tray' and 'Johnny was a Shoemaker,' uttered through an unclean imagination, and set to the music of 'What do You Think of Me?'"

Having thus gone up to Poet Webb "with head uncovered,' the slighted one, not satisfied with his fearfully scathing opening address, proceeds as follows to dissect the various effusions of the said Webb :

"The first is 'The June Month.' It is made up of hackneyed rhymes, worn-out sentiments, and threadbare phraseology. It is twenty lines in length, and in that brief space occur the following trite old plagiarisms :

> The blossom and the bursting bud
> Are woven in her tresses.
> With lips like rare-ripe cherries.
> And wreathe its brim with roses.
> The birds all leave the open plains,
> And seek the hazel covers.
> And every breeze that fans her cheek
> Comes laden with caresses.
> Her apron filled with butter-cups.
> We're going down the meadow path.

These commonplaces are regarded as poetic in the original, but Mr. Webb makes a felonious and merciless use of them in 'The June Month.' The next is 'Das Meermadcheu.' The title suggests an attempt by Mr. Webb to intimate that he is able to read Goethe and Schiller in the original. It is something about a mermaid—exactly what, we are unable to discern. A man rides down to the sea, and a mermaid steals his horse; that's about all we can make out of it. The conceit was probably stolen by Mr. Webb and left unfinished. Some of the imagery in this poem is very striking. Of the mermaid, Mr. Webb says :

> Her skin was whiter than words can speak,
> The blush of the sea-shell lit her cheek.
> Her lips had ripened in coral caves,
> And her eyes were blue as the deeper waves.
> Her long yellow hair fell soft and free,
> Like a shower of amber upon the sea.

We have no right to object to the sea-shell blush of the monster's cheek, or her coral lips, or the ocean blue of her eyes; Homer made use of the same expression 4,000 years ago, and all of 4,000 poets have since appropriated the figures; but the description of the mermaid's 'long yellow hair,' which fell 'like a shower of amber upon the sea,' is Webb's. It can be no one's else. 'My friends,' said Dow, Jr., 'when it rains buttermilk, may your basins be right side up.' A buttermilk dispensation from above, and a shower of amber would be alike remarkable. Should it fall in chunks, our prayer would be for the protection of a potash-kettle or a brick vault. In the opinion of some, amber is the fossilized excrement of a marine monster. Mr. Webb probably refers to a shower of the mephitic substance in its primitive condition. The poem in its present aspect will not do to handle."

Having thus given vent to his bile, the slighted one, before taking leave of the offending Webb, bestows upon him the following advice, free gratis :

"Mr. Webb writes prose with some facility; but, with Outcroppings before us, we esteem it a duty to advise him never again to venture upon a poem with a thesis more exalted than a didactic description of the calamities of an inverted milk wagon."

[As the Doctor laid the paper on the table, the Governor took up the poems of Tennyson, and, handing them to the speaker, requested that, as he was talking of criticism at the present day, he would favor them with his opinion of the Poet Laureate.]

Tennyson, my friends, is a scholar, as he has undoubtedly shown by the beautiful language in which he has clothed Enoch Arden and one or two other of his effusions; but all scholars are not great poets, which fact is placed beyond dispute in the very same work, its plot being as old as the hills, while the story with the characters' names changed is as well known to every old sailor as are the habits of Mother Carey's chickens.

That he has written two or three very good things I will not deny; but for every good poem he has inflicted on the public, he has also given us more than fifty thrashy, meaningless, nonsensical, silly ones. I feel that instead of the public owing him any praise for what he has done, he is indebted to that public for its leniency towards him in not passing him by unnoticed.

Should I be disposed to criticise his works after the manner of the California critics, I would be compelled to speak of his effusions in the following strain :

Tennyson, as a poet, is admired for his simplicity. Here are a few instances of his remarkable simplicity :

> GO NOT, HAPPY DAY.
> Go not, happy day,
> From the shining fields,
> Go not, happy day,
> Till the maiden yields.
> Rosy is the West,
> Rosy is the South,
> Roses are her cheeks
> And a rose her mouth.
> When the happy Yes
> Falters from her lips,
> Pass and blush the news
> O'er the blowing ships.
> Over blowing seas,
> Over seas at rest,
> Pass the happy news—
> Blush it through the West:
> Till the red man dance
> By his red cedar-tree,
> And the red man's babe
> Leap beyond the sea."

If the kind of simplicity shown in the above makes its author a poet-laureate, where ought we to place the composer of the lines :

> "Goosey, goosey gander,
> Where shall I wander?
> Up stairs, down stairs,
> In my lady's chamber.
> There was an old man
> Who wouldn't say his prayers,
> So I took him by his left leg
> And threw him down stairs."

These verses are not only simple, but are commendable, because we can readily recognize that the author is talking about a gander and an old man who suffered considerably for being irreligious. I am sorry that I cannot say so much for Tennyson's verses. They may be looked upon as very simple, true, but what on earth is he writing about? How came he to be so hard pushed for a word to rhyme with "lips," that he had to drag in such an ambiguous word as "the blowing ships?" I have heard of blowing porpoises, and of men who were "blowers," but of blowing ships, never. Perhaps, however, he was thinking at the time of blowing men, as in the line which follows that mysterious and not very clear expression, he again raises the wind in the shape of "over blowing seas," which, when straighted out, may be looked upon as a classic announcement of the fact that when a man is half-seas over he is very apt to commence blowing. Finally, observe with what masterly ambiguity he commands all the gossippers in town to "pass the happy news" until an unfortunate red man, whom he most ruthlessly drags in where he is not wanted, becomes so exasperated that he dances a fandango by "a red cedar tree," and his offspring becomes so forgetful of the duty which it owes its parent as to "leap beyond the sea," instead of taking passage in a sailing ship, as any other individual would.

Having thus exposed Tennyson's simplicity, let me show you, my friends, that he is a plagiarist of the worst stripe.

For example, let me call your attention to the first four lines in one of his best poems, "The Charge of the Light Brigade :"

> "Half a league, half a league,
> Half a league onward—
> Rode the six hundred."

Every word in this is plagiarized. The three first half leagues (making in all, if I mistake not, one league and a-half) and the six hundred in the last line are taken from the tables in Johnson's Arithmetic. (See page 26, chap. I.) "The Valley of Death" phrase is taken from the Bible.

For the other words, "all," and "in," and "rode," he is, most likely, indebted to Shakspeare, who, in turn, stole them from his predecessors in the field of literature.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having reserved from their final Subscription List a Limited Number of Unassessable Shares, (the remaining shares of the Company having been taken up by the stockholders,) hereby offer the same for sale at the original subscription price of Sixteen Dollars each, payable in cash. Every holder of a share will be entitled to a portion of the Company's lands, having the privilege to settle thereon and participate in all the advantages and profits of the enterprise, and special privileges granted to this Company by an Imperial Decree of Maximilian, dated 9th January, 1866, without being subjected to the conditions of regular Government emigrants, this Company settling upon their own lands, secured by private purchase, and held under indisputable Spanish titles.

Shareholders becoming actual settlers will also have the privilege of any employment upon the Company's plantation. Portions of land will be allotted to settlers, to be held by them until a final division makes it their property.

For the purpose of increasing the value of the Company's land, and to create all the comforts of a home and society, it is the intention of the company to form a regular settlement and to lay out a town adjoining their present plantation into building lots, which will likewise be fairly divided between the 8,000 shares which comprise the total number of the company.

A large number of shareholders will settle upon the company's lands after the rainy season in October next. Many of them may then be employed by the company, or by others able to plant for themselves, or in developing the mineral resources of the adjoining mountains, etc., etc.

Men of all trades and professions, desiring to emigrate to Mexico, will have great advantages as shareholders of this company. They will find the lands already purchased for them at a rate equivalent to a free gift, to be held by each shareholder as his property, protected by the best Spanish titles, and the good will of all political parties now contending for the reins of government; the climate the most salubrious, and the land rich and fertile beyond description; every kind of game abounding; the rivers full of fish and with extensive beds of large oysters; altogether, a country where it is easy to procure a livelihood and the comforts of a home with less labor and less capital than in any other part of the world.

The extensive placer diggings, veins of silver, and solid quartz ledges, which are to be found in the immediate vicinity, and acknowledged to be rich and very extensive, can, by the presence of a number of settlers, be profitably developed. Many of these mines are to be found within the limits of the company's grant. The Sierra Madre or Mother Mountain of Mexico, situated only within about twenty miles from the coast, can be reached and developed with greater facility than the more remote remote mines in the interior, and will therefore make the company's lands the most desirable to locate upon.

For Maps and Survey, and further information, apply at the office of the MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON CO., Beige's Book Store, Ross House, Montgomery street, between the hours of 11 and 1 o'clock.

☞ All the assessable stock having been taken up by mutual subscription of stockholders, the company will have no more shares to offer after the limited number of unassessable shares have been placed, and shall prefer to sell these to actual settlers—a single share of which will be sufficient to entitle them to a large portion of the lands.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED shareholders in the Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having investigated and satisfied ourselves of the importance of the enterprise, recommend the same to the public. We are convinced that under the management of the present officers of the company, with their efforts to induce industrious parties to locate upon the land, that the enterprise must become very profitable to all parties interested, and most beneficial to actual settlers.

THE GHOST AT THE FUNERAL.

THE funeral pageant fills the aisles,
Slowly they come, all robed in black,
Behind her coffined form, whose smiles
Drew my heart, tortured, to the rack,
In those sad years of mine when earth,
Beside those smiles, held little worth.

How brief the time now seems, since I
With shroud and pall was lying here;
And did they think that she could die,
And be entombed, and I not near?
I, who, despite her rank and pride,
Knelt for her love, and failed—and died!

A sunbeam from the narrow pane
Slants, and falls on the saintly face,
That seems so like a child again,
In snowy frame of flowers and lace;
And from the white hands, shapely small,
The sweet tube roses droop and fall.

How still she sleeps! ah, too much grace
To be within the grave's restraint;
How calm the look, and pure the face,
That Raphael would have loved to paint,
Had she lived in those other years
When artists were of gods the peers.

The organist now takes his seat—
The seat that I filled long ago—
And they a funeral strain repeat,
That shakes the roof with notes of woe.
The carved old saint upon the wall
Seems ready on his knees to fall.

Nay, let me touch the keys once more;
My hand can draw forth mightier tones;
For all the zeal of years before
Has gathered fire within my bones,
To give voice now to this weird gloom,
And bid her welcome to her tomb.

Beneath his hands I touch the keys;
And sobs, and sighs, and tempest tears
Wail out, that make the warm blood freeze—
The outcry of my martyred years.
Nor dream they of the ghostly form
That rocks and bows beneath the storm.

Well may they wonder what new fire
Their organist to-day hath found,
That makes the half-affrighted choir
Tremble beneath the rush of sound;
This grand, bewildering burst of song,
Imprisoned in the tomb so long.

And half I fear, and wonder, lest
She rise, and come with stately tread,
To bid me break no more her rest;
But no! they bear away their dead;
And while their sombre draperies wave,
I'll creep back to my dusky grave. [Longfellow.

LIMITS OF THE IMPROBABLE IN FICTION.

NOTHING is easier in the opinion of many littérateurs than to criticise a novel. Few things are in reality more difficult. We really believe that Grote's Plato, Mill on Hamilton, Anybody on the Steam Engine, Brillat-Savarin on the Philosophy of Grub, Science, History, Philosophy, what you will, are easier to appreciate and discuss properly than even a fair second-class tale or romance. The reason lies in the essential character, the differentia, of the novel. It is fictitious, avowedly in most cases, really in all, yet it must resemble truth. In some species there need be less of this resemblance than in others; a romance, to take an obvious case, has more license than a novel of manners: but verisimilitude cannot be altogether dispensed with. Even when the characters belong wholly or in part to an imaginary class of beings, there must be a conventional probability. A fairy tale must have a certain "keeping," if it would avoid being sheer burlesque or sheer nonsense.

Now, at the very first step we take, as soon as we ask what is natural or unnatural, probable or improbable, in a given situation of certain characters, we are involved in almost boundless field of speculation. Suppose, for instance, your friend Smith says to you apropos of the last novel in vogue, "I don't think the hero in his affair with So-and-so behaves exactly as a gentleman ought to." You disagree with him. Here are the materials for an immense discussion at once. What your standard of a gentleman is, whether the English, or the Continental, or the American, or neither, but some ideal compounded of them all; what the standard finally agreed on would require of a gentleman in that particular contingency; how far it is probable that a gentleman would deviate from the standard under certain provocations and temptations, and how far he would be permitted to do so without forfeiting his character as a gentleman; what has been the conduct of gentlemen in similar or analogous circumstances, etc., etc., etc., almost ad infinitum. Or take a purely physical matter-of-fact question. You say, "The hero rides his horse so many miles: any horse ought to have dropped long before. When the horse does break down, he proceeds a-foot, and, after a long run, climbs a wall which would puzzle a professed gymnast." Then Smith, who is well up in equestrian and pedestrian statistics, quotes Bell's Life or Pierce Egan to prove that horses have carried men to a greater distance in less time, and men have surmounted greater obstacles. You perhaps rejoin that the horses were regularly trained, and the men Indians or Borderers, whereas, etc., etc. To which again Smith, "But under pressure of strong excitement," etc., etc.; thus you may keep bandying the question back and forward half an hour. As to the naturalness and probability of certain representations of manners and society, the field of controversy is equally fertile. Are Balzac's novels correct pictures of French life or are they utterly extravagant and imaginary? Are such books as "Wuthering Heights" and "The Tenant of Wildfell Hall" gross caricatures of Yorkshire, or slightly exaggerated sketches? The discrepancies in the accounts of countries by different travellers show that having gone over the ground is no sure criterion of accuracy in narratives professing to be veracious. When the very facts are so difficult to determine, how much more puzzled must we be with the inferences!

Some critics think they have found a very general solution in human nature, "which is the same everywhere and in all ages." But this guide will not lead us into particulars. There are broad motives at work all over the world—love, avarice, ambition, and the like—but all their details are so modified by a thousand influences of law and government, custom and tradition, that they no more help you to determine how certain persons will act under certain circumstances than the knowledge that all men require food will help you in deciding whether a particular people (say the Chinese) really eat rats. Can an American understand why an Englishman objects to another Englishman's marrying his deceased wife's sister? Can an Englishman understand how a certain kind of sensation newspaper has attained its circulation among respectable and even religious Americans? Can you make a Frenchman understand how the most frightful consequences do not result from allowing Anglo-Saxon young ladies to "wander at their own sweet will?" Human nature does not manifest itself in the same way everywhere, whatever its potentialities may be; and as to the difference of its manifestations in different ages, any historical knowledge beyond the most superficial will settle that point. Even the proposition that human nature is the same in the same age and country must be taken with qualifications, as we shall see.

There is a strong tendency in the best English journals and reviews (shared by such of our own periodicals as have any coherent ideas on the subject of criticism) to condemn the incidents of a novel as physically or morally impossible according to some very limited standard of the critic's own, standards which, if carried out rigorously, would render all fiction, except what we may call the Dutch school, impossible, and confine us to a vista bounded at one end by Miss Austen and Anthony Trollope, at the other by the "Pumplighter" and all those works which Charles Kingsley relegates to the purgatory of stupid books.

This tendency was strikingly exemplified a few years ago on the appearance of "Les Miserables," a production sufficiently open to criticism. Nothing could be weaker than its pseudo-philosophical speculation on government and society, at which Louis Napoleon must have laughed in his sleeve to see his own rule strengthened by the self-exposé of his brilliant and bitter enemy. But the magnificent romance, so independent of the speculative rubbish that all the latter might easily have been eliminated from it, was generally approached by its reviewers in the spirit of very small mice nibbling around a very large cheese. They saw in it all manner of improbabilities. How could Jean Valjean climb a garden-wall with a child on his back? How could he elude the vigilance of the police? Why did Fantine, who had walked from Paris, never think of walking back to look after her child instead of trusting to the reports of the Thenardiers? And so on ad nauseam.

Now, if these English reviewers had but looked back to the current history of their own country, they might easily have found events as abnormal and startling as any of the incidents in Hugo's book. There was the unfathomed mystery of the Waterloo Bridge murder—if murder it was—with its carpet-bag of mangled remains. There was the attempted assassination of officer Murray by usurer Roberts, a crime which moved half the newspapers and magazines to exclaim: "If this had been represented in fiction, how we should have cried out against its monstrous improbability." If hairbreadth escapes were required, there was no need to go back to Jack Sheppard's prison-breaking or the well-authenticated case of the man who had a gig-shaft run through him and lived thirty years after. The officer was then living—and for aught we know is still—who rode over a precipice more than a hundred feet high, breaking every bone in his horse's body, but escaping himself without serious or permanent injury. So much for English life. Let us look a moment nearer home. Suppose some novelist of our own had, previous to any of those occurrences, introduced to his readers a Burdell-Cunningham murder or one of those causes célebres which so recently scandalized—or ought to have scandalized—our public, should we not have cried haro! on him as a social, if not a national, libeller? In short, whether we look at physical or moral phenomena, or at combinations of both, the more we consult history and experience, the more must we be impressed with the truth of the adage, Le vrai n'est pas toujours le vraisemblable. Why, then, blame the novelist for introducing improbabilities which are so often actualities? Do we expect fiction to be more natural than nature herself? Probably the error springs from a confusion of ideas, clumsy enough, yet easily fallen into.

There is a class of novels, already referred to, of which Miss Austen used to be, and Mr. Trollope bids fair to become, the type. They are novels of manners, romans de société, and their whole value depends on their fidelity to the everyday life which they represent. They may have an elaborate and artistic plot; they do not exclude striking situations; but the plot and the situations are secondary matters. In such works abnormal events have no place. They represent everyday life, and not only are extraordinary accidents repugnant to their character, but the most trivial error or incongruity in petty details is fatal to their pretensions. If, for instance, in a story of American life, a young gentleman and lady not betrothed or related were represented walking down the Fifth Avenue arm-in-arm, this slight inaccuracy would be sufficient to condemn the book at once.

But a romancer, a writer like Hugo or Dickens or Reade, not only has liberty to make use of the abnormal and improbable, but may be said to possess this as his peculiar province. His dealings with everyday routine are only episodical, by way of relief. The romantic, in other words, the unusual, is his staple.

Is there, then, no limit to his license? Certainly there is; but only the impossible, the absurd, and the indubitably false are on the further side of it. Sue's "Juif Errant" overstepped the certos fines because it was a tissue of monstrous absurdities. The whole story of the treasure which furnished the motive of action was, from beginning to end, in its final destruction as well as its long preservation, not improbable but impossible. Again, it should not be allowable for the novelist to arrange the laws of his country according to his own vague ideas of them, although half the recent English writers of fiction, from Dickens down to Mrs. Wood and lower, seem to consider themselves above law, as the old German potentate was above grammar.

With such exceptions, and provided he preserves that consistency and individuality which will render his characters lifelike, we think the romancer should have full swing in his romance, and his readers should modify the old theological dogma just a little, and believe, or, at any rate, read, because it is improbable.—The Nation.

CHARLES LAMB used to relate with great glee that his theological investigations were exhausted in devising a scheme for equalizing punishment after death. This he proposed to do by having a special hell for Scotchmen, in which the brimstone should be left out, thereby consigning them in a double sense to the "old scratch." Some chap out West has, however, improved upon Lamb's conceit, and narrates the following story somewhat at the expense of Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania: He says he dreamed that he once made a visit to Inferno, and while engaged in conversation with the proprietor, an imp announced that the Pennsylvania Radical was at the door seeking admittance. Old Nick promptly and emphatically refused him entrance upon the ground that he would be continually disturbing the peace and order of the place. The imp soon returned, saying that Thad. insisted on coming in, declaring that he had no other place to go to. After considerable anxious reflection, Old Nick's face suddenly brightened as with a new idea, and he exclaimed: "I've got it! Tell the Janitor to give him six bushels of brimstone and a box of matches, and let him go and start a little institution of his own. I can't have him here."

"Is your master up?" asked an early visitor of a nobleman's valet. "Yes, sir," rejoined the valet, with great innocence; "the butler and I carried him up about 3 o'clock."

SPECIAL NOTICES.

To the Sick and Afflicted.—We can honestly recommend those who are suffering from diseases of long standiug, or from the use of mercury, to call at the Electric Medical Institute. The system practiced by Dr. Howard and his associates is the most sensible we have heard advocated. If there is anything that deserves the name of humbug, it is that which claims to cure every disease with one remedy or system. It would not be more ridiculous if Dr Howard's Rheumatic remedy was advertised as a cure-all. In diseases peculiar to females Dr. Howard has no superior; particularly in chronic irregularities he is unsurpassed by any other physiciau in the State. We are personally acquainted with a number of ladies who have been restored to health at the insti tute, notwitstanding their complaints being pronounced incurable by some of the best physicians in the city. To all who need the assistance of a physician, we would say, call at the Electric Medical Institute, 648 Washington street, before going elsewhere. In Dr. Howard you will find a gentleman who is worthy of your confidence.—S. F. Irish People.

A REMARKABLE CURE.

DR. HOWARD'S RHEUMATIC MIXTURE

Cures Rheumatism in three to ten days. Warranted, or no pay required. Howard's Medical and Surgical Institute, No. 648 Washington street, near Kearny.

Read the following letter:

San Francisco, February 12, 1866.

Dr. P. Howard—Dear Sir: I have been afflicted with Rheumatism for seven years; a great part of the time I was unable to do anything, and my ankle would swell to such an extent that I could not wear a boot. I tried every known remedy, and many Physicians who would insist on my confining myself to my room; but it was of no use: I only became worse and almost discouraged. I accidentally saw one of your bills, and although I had little confidence in your remedy, I commenced using it, and you may judge of my surprise when, after using it three days, I was able to go to work. I am now as well as ever I was in my life, and I have not lost any time while taking your remedy, except the first three days.

In order to benefit others, and to assure you of my gratitude, you may publish this if you think proper to do so. Your friend,

R. W. Mabery, 120 Natoma street.

Dr. C. W. Moore's Medical and Surgical Institute.—In speaking of this Institution, the Sunday Mercury says: "Aside from the most skilful treatment and nursing, the large, airy and elegantly-furnished rooms, will enable the patients to enjoy all the comforts and luxuries of a home. All in all, we regard Dr. Moore and his Institute a most valuable acquisition to the Pacific Coast—the need of which we have long since felt." See advertisement.

Wanted—Agents to sell, by subscription only the most popular work ever written: "GRANT AND SHERMAN; their Campaigns and Generals." By the world-renowned historian, Hon. J. T. Headley, author of Washington and his Generals, Sacred Mountains, etc. Agents are taking as high as thirty subscribers per day, and all agree in pronouncing it the most saleable work they ever took hold of. The people want Headley's illustrated "GRANT AND SHERMAN," etc. For terms and territory, address E. E. Shear, No. 8 Montgomery Street, and Box 1,430, San Francisco, California

Many of the Diseases which hitherto baffled and defied the highest medical skill, are now speedily cured by Dr. H. A. Benton, whose processes of applying electricity receive the approbation of all prominent physicians. The nerves are directly reached, and patients suffering from chronic complaints find almost immediate relief, and rapidly recover their former healthy condition. Dr. Benton is a physicius of excellent reputation, and as a Medical Electrician occupies the front rank in his profession.—Gotden Era.

Buggies and Carriages.—If you want a trim neat, light, and yet durable style of buggy or carriage, go to Nos. 37 and 39 Webb street, between Sacramento and California, where you will find just such a vehicle as will suit your taste. Pollard & Carvill not only deal in these articles, but manufacture them to order, and do repairing, painting, trimming and blacksmithing with dispatch and neatness. Go and see them.—California Leader.

Wagons.—Every species of wagons that any one can need, made of the best material, well fitted and finished, can be found at the Depot of Mills & Evans, 587 Market street, two doors from Second. Light, Express, Milk and Thoroughbrace wagons, also Lumber Gears, Extra Poles and Whiffletrees, with Lead Bars, are kept constantly on hand.—California Leader.

MONEY TO LOAN.—$5,000 to loan, in small sums, on City Property, for a term of years; repayments received in monthly instalments. Deposits received at 1 per cent per month from month to month. Apply to the California Building and Loan Society, 406 Montgomery street, opposite Wells, Fargo & Co's.

For the best finished, fashionable hats, go to McGunn & Co.'s, Hatters, 634 Washington street, two doors below the Plaza.

On the "Qui Vive."—A large number of fashionable ladies of San Francisco, who are noted for the graceful style and elegance of their dress, as well as for the irresistible attractiveness of their fascinating smiles, which the consciousness of being fashionably and tastefully dressed spreads over their classical features, are ever on the qui vive to take the advantage of "circumstances" and to decorate, adorn, and embellish with every imaginable kind of ladies' dress trimmings, buttons, gloves, etc., their graceful figures, at a price so low that any and all can afford to dress fashionably, and even elegantly. The present victims of these vigilant and economical leaders of the fashion, are the members of the celebrated firm of M. Homberger & Co., 300 Kearny street, corner of Bush, who keep constantly on hand a superior and extensive assortment of ladies' dress trimmings, buttons, hosiery, gloves, woolen ware, and fancy goods, also a splendid lot of Berlin zephyr worsted, all of which they offer at greatly reduced prices. In consequence of which, the store is crowded from morning till night, no one leaving without making purchases, and all going home both suited and delighted with the style of the article as well as the price paid for it.—Golden Era.

Concord Wagons and Harness.—The Pacific Concord Carriage Manufactory is prepared to supply the Pacific Coast with Concord wagons and harness made to order. The members comprising this firm have long been in the employ of the celebrated manufacturing house of L. Downing & Son, Concord, New Hampshire; so that parties wishing Concord wagons or harness can obtain just the same quality of article here and save 25 per cent. on their purchase money. We have seen some of their workmanship, and can recommend it to the public Address Belduke & Co, 820 Folsom street, between Fourth and Fifth.—San Francisco Leader.

Dainty Work.—About the daintiest work we ever saw were specimens of hair jewelry at the establishmeut of Mrs. C. Cook, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, yesterday. This lady manufactures all sorts of jewelry—watch-chains, earrings, finger rings, breastpins, and various other kinds of ornaments—from human hair. We witnessed the process of manufacture, and it is intricate and ingenious in the highest degree.—S. F. Examiner.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

San Francisco, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend, Joseph Sparrow.

Accident and Loss of Life.—With the details of the dreadful disasters of the Brother Jonathan and the Yosemite fresh in memory, it is not needful that we should urge on the public the importunce of guarding as fully as possible not only against the recurrence of such startling calamities, but also as far as they can against the consequences that arise from them. Accidents are terribly frequent in this new State of ours. Hardly a day passes but we have to record some loss of life, or terrible mangling that leaves the victim with hardly a wish to live. Stringent legislation is demanded to protect travellers from carelessness and criminal negligence of public carriers. It is with great interest that we have watched the rapid growth of Accident Insurance Companies, and we are happy to know that the New York Accidental Insurance Company, established by some of the wealthiest capitalists of the East, have placed their agency in the hands of Bigelow & Brother, Insurance Agents, of this city. We advise every one to take out a policy. The premium is very small—the price of a good cigar only per day—while the benefits are great; $25 per week, if disabled, or $5,000 in case of death. Who would not give $2 50 to be insured for a trip to Washoe, or 25 cents for a trip to Sacramento City? That's all it costs. We predict a large business for the agency in this city. The Company have complied with the State law, and are fully prepared to issue policies, or travelling tickets, at once.—S. F. Call.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

Dr. Wm. K. Doherty's Medical and Surgica Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

Opinions of the Press.—We call the particular attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. P. Howard, in another column. It gives us pleasure to recommend to those who need the assistance of a physician, the valuable services of Dr. P. Howard and his associates. In a city like San Francisco, where there are so many disreputable concerns, it is gratifying to find one worthy of the confidence and patronage of the people. At the Electric Medical and Surgical Institute, 648 Washington street, the gentlemen conducting it are eminently qualified, and the system they practice is based on sound and philosophical principles, comprising within itself the Hydropathic and Electropathic systems, and the Electric practice of medicines. To the ladies we can recommend the Electric system as particularly adapted to their delicate constitutions. The rooms are fitted up in splendid style, and the Bathroom is large and convenient. Their Electropathic instrument is one of the best we have ever seen, having six different currents of great power, yet so well controlled and regulated that it can be applied to the most delicate. The numerous patients thronging the Institute, and their happy faces, speak volumes in its favor. The best surgical skill is also to be found at the Institute. In fact, we are satisfied that there is more scientific attainment than at any other Institute in the State. Dr. P. Howard was, in former years, the proprietor of the Electropathic Institute, and established for it a reputation second only to the Eclectic Institute. Being compelled to visit Mexico on business, the Institute passed into other hands. Dr. P Howard has been long and favorably known, and to those who are in need of the services of a physician we recommend him as in every way worthy of their confidence.—S. F. Irish News.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quick silver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived by thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

THE WIND-HARP.

PLAY on, ye unseen minstrels! play me more
With your light fingers on the silken strings:
I cannot weary—no! the strains ye pour
Are far too like celestial whisperings.

Spirit of Melody! surpassing fair!
Thou nymph whose home is heaven's angelic bower!
Thy precious tresses woo the dancing air
In matchless luxury at this blessed hour.

Thou God of grace and souls and symphony!
When sorrow's night-wind sweeps my yielding heart,
May all its chords like these harmonious be—
From all may Faith's adoring music start.

INIGOINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 7th, 1866.

A FRIEND of mine has just left the office, with whom I had a very angry discussion.

We were discussing a fault of a mutual friend, or acquaintance at least, and he rung in on me one of those hackneyed phrases for which I entertain a sovereign dislike: "The Infirmities of Genius."

"Don't be too hard on the poor fellow," said he, "it is one of the infirmities of genius."

If getting so tight in one day that it takes three days to attain one's normal condition—assuming that sobriety is the normal condition of Genius—and then feeling like a biled owl or an underdone lobster, for a week to come, is one of the infirmities of Genius, deliver me from it, and commend me forever to that plain level of Common Sense above which I have never yet felt any ambition to rise.

I have so much respect for Genius that I think it is rather above the weaknesses of life than otherwise. Pressing one's Cypress Juice too heavily is no more an infirmity of Genius than picking pockets is.

If it were what a Genius I'd be.

So far as my observation goes, it is more an infirmity of fools than of men of brains. Go to the station-house any morning and you will see twenty or thirty bloated, blear-eyed specimens of humanity who were snatched the night before for being howling drunk in the streets. Are they geniuses?

Each one of them is probably the evil genius of some wife whom he abuses or some family which he neglects, but to my thinking no higher rank can be claimed for any of them.

All men, under certain conditions, are liable to step over the bounds of moderation and press the rosy after a fashion that does not contribute much to the charm of their conversation or their beauty, but I really do not think that this should be counted as an infirmity of genius. Such people are very often genii-al fellows, but, no joke being meant, I don't see the proposition as an established truth.

We would have many a genius among us could this special infirmity be counted upon as one of the indications of extraordinary talent.

There is no denying that Noah, the first man on record who crooked his elbow till all the joints of his neck cracked, was a genius, for he built the ark. But there was some excuse for him. There are very few who wouldn't have gone back on fresh water, after having had as much of it for so long a time as he did.

Solomon was considerable of a genius in his way, and got off some very clever conundrums, and, if my memory serves me rightly, he advised all his friends to "look not upon the wine when it is red."

Some commentators have thought that he was in the white wine interest, while others imagine that he simply meant to inculcate the idea of shutting the eyes when drinking Burgundy, so as to get the full flavor of it, but I think nothing of the kind. He simply meant that the best way is to jerk your glass over your shoulder when you've got enough, even if you are drinking in a two-bit house.

Carlyle was a genius, and he didn't drink—though one might very well think he did, to read some of his writings. Nor does Emerson swing his stimulant to any considerable extent, though his Bramah might lead one to suppose that, by the assistance of the Red Slayer he mentions, he had managed to get pretty well "slewed." Neither Tennyson nor Longfellow are much given to dissipation, and Bryant, Bowman, Herbert C. Dorr, and several others that I could name, are equally free from such an infirmity of genius.

Some people say Sam Brannan drinks, but I do not believe it. Some say Mark Twain drinks, and I do believe that: but these are the only two geniuses in town, I can now think of, whom people have ever talked about.

On the whole, I think that Geniuses have no more right to overstep the bounds of moderation in anything than other people have, and when they do, they should be put through an exactly similar course of sprouts. If they are noisy and boisterous, snatch them off to the watch-house; and if they are disagreeable, overbearing, and insulting, trounce them well. Deliver me from all who travel on their genius, and of whom you hear people say: "Ah, if he only would!" and "Ah, if he only wouldn't!"

Perhaps it is one of the Infirmities of Genius to go out to Professor Whitney's Sanatarium Salt Water Baths, at North Beach, and flounder around in one of them for two or three hours, as I did the other Sunday.

Verily, there is one thing of which I can assure any one who is ever given to the infirmities of genius—he feels a mighty different creature on coming out of the tub from what he felt on going in.

The most prevailing infirmity of genius that I know of now-a-days is getting married, and to this amiable weakness my old friend Col. Harney has fallen a victim.

He paid the penalty of his sins on Tuesday last, at two o'clock precisely, in Grace Church, Bishop Kip officiating and performing the last sad ceremonies.

A mutual friend told me that the Colonel spent the previous evening quietly and composedly, though not in prayer. On being asked if he would take anything before retiring, he said "No," in a firm voice, but finally requested that a weak cup of tea and a tract entitled The Whole Duty of Man be brought him. Having swallowed both, he retired to bed, remarking that he must be up early in the morning, for a very long day was before him.

It turned out to be quite as broad as it was long.

His last moments were peculiarly impressive and edifying. He was dressed a little more nicely than usual—dressed very much, in fact, like a lamb, to be served up at two with the usual ceremonies and accompaniments. He lost his composure but once, and then was only betrayed into the slight mistake of imagining that he was in the County Court, that Bishop Kip was Judge Cowles, and that his bride was a witness whom he was swearing in:

"You do solemnly swear that in this case, buz-z-z-z-z-z-z-z-z-z-ing but the truth, (hold up your right hand) S'elpyegoud."

Corrected by the Bishop, he apologized for the mistake and the ceremony was concluded "with credit to all concerned," all present wishing and believing in their hearts as our friend walked off with his radiant bride that to Benjamina, though not the youngest of the family, the good portion had indeed fallen.

And now, just at present, the only other infirmity of genius that occurs to me is that of writing too much.

To this I plead guilty. But having a certain space to fill every Saturday, my dear public, Que voulez vous?

"Que voulez vous" is French for Sheep's Foot. It should be queer wooly woo ("woo" being short for wool,) but the French have no w in their language—a singular philological which caused an Irishman to exclaim, "Thin how the divil do they spell wagon?"

In another part of the paper the editor is preaching a sermon about spectacular pieces which will no doubt prove singularly edifying to all who read it. I, for my part, must confess that I delight in them, and only regret that Shakspeare didn't contrive Hamlet a little after the Sheep's Foot pattern.

Think of the effect that could be produced by having the ghost come popping up through a chest of drawers, standing on his head for a few minutes, and then disappearing in a flash of blue fire, with a strong smell of sulphur.

And what a neat little piece of business it would have been to bring the ghost of Ophelia back to daylight, in the shape of a pretty ballet girl, with nice legs.

Some persons are opposed to the sway of the present o-leg-garchy.

I am not.

When no other bail could be given, I've known leg bail to serve a most excellent turn. And it is by no means every artist upon the present stage that can give even this security for a respectable appearance before the foot-lights.

I submit, however, that under the present dispensation the name of these illuminators should be changed to leg-lights.

Ah, well! enough, perhaps, of one subject, but why have I not as much right to still harp upon grass-tanglers as the Bulletin upon the Legislature?

The printers and proof-readers are the main sufferers after all, for they are the only ones who are compelled to read all that is written in either paper.

And what patience printers must have! Think of the illegible manuscripts they have to spell over, the sins of omission and commission that are shouldered off upon them, but which properly belong to the writers. It is little wonder that a theory should be built up that Job knew something about printing, for, aside from his remarkable words: "Oh, that my words were now written! Oh, that they were printed in a book, that they were graven with an iron pen, with lead in a rock forever!" his trials could not be considered complete without a little turn at the composing-desk.

Even now-a-days, the sign "Job Printing" is often met with. An advertisement informing the public that ALL KINDS OF JOB PRINTING ARE DONE AT THIS OFFICE WITH NEATNESS AND DESPATCH, AT REASONABLE RATES, will be found at the head of the editorial columns.

It has stood there some time, and, to my mind, is quite as interesting as anything else on the page...

Another "stick-full," to fill out the column, cries the faithful foreman.

So I must furnish another stick, though it break my own back—that aches with being cramped over a desk, when it ought to be braced back against a pair of strong pullers, on this bright, beautiful morning.

Does it not seem hard to ask a writer, who is stuck where he stands, for another "stick?"

To my thinking, there is such a thing as running the brain dry. Even a town pump can be exhausted if the handle be too persistently worked in a dry season.

When I wore a goatee, and came to a full stop like the present one, no ideas flowing and my pen rusting with the ink upon it like a ploughshare standing still in the furrow, I used to sit and pull my goatee for an hour or two, in mild meditation. By and by the ideas would flow and I could start in again.

The process always suggested itself to me as something very analogous to milking the brain.

Alas, I now can only sit and scratch my poll, like a Poll Parrot, and as for ideas, my skull is like a desert. Tickle some soil with a hoe and it will laugh with a harvest, but not so with arid sands. Only one thing remains to fill out the column, and that is the signature of

THE STORY OF THE FAITHFUL SOUL.

FOUNDED ON AN OLD FRENCH LEGEND.

THE fettered Spirits linger
In purgatorial pain,
With penal fires effacing
Their last faint earthly stain,
Which Life's imperfect sorrow
Had tried to cleanse in vain.

Yet, on each feast of Mary
Their sorrow finds release,
For the Great Archangel Michael
Comes down and bids it cease;
And the name of these brief respites
Is called "Our Lady's Peace."

Yet once—so runs the Legend—
When the Archangel came,
And all these holy spirits
Rejoiced at Mary's name,
One voice alone was wailing,
Still wailing on the same.

And though a great Te Deum
The happy echoes woke,
This one discordant wailing
Through the sweet voices broke;
So when St. Michael questioned,
Thus the poor spirit spoke:

"I am not cold or thankless,
Although I still complain;
I prize Our Lady's blessing,
Although it comes in vain
To still my bitter anguish,
Or quench my ceaseless pain.

"On earth a heart that loved me
Still lives and mourns me there,
And the shadow of his anguish
Is more than I can bear;
All the torment that I suffer
Is the thought of his despair.

"The evening of my bridal Death took my Life away;
Not all Love's passionate pleading
Could gain an hour's delay.
And he I left has suffered
A whole year since that day.

"If I could only see him—
If I could only go
And speak one word of comfort
And solace—then I know
He would endure with patience,
And strive against his woe."

Thus the Archangel answered:
"Your time of pain is brief,
And soon the peace of Heaven
Will give you full relief;
Yet if his earthly comfort
So much outweigh your grief,

"Then through a special mercy
I offer you this grace—
You may seek him who mourns you,
And look upon his face,
And speak to him of comfort
For one short minute's space.

"But when that time is ended,
Return here, and remain
A thousand years in torment,
A thousand years in pain:
Thus dearly must you purchase
The comfort he will gain."

The Lime-trees' shade at evening
Is spreading broad and wide;
Beneath their fragrant arches,
Pace slowly, side by side,
In low and tender converse,
A Bridegroom and his Bride.

The night is calm and stilly,
No other sound is there
Except their happy voices:
What is that cold bleak air
That passes through the Lime-trees,
And stirs the Bridegroom's hair?

While one low cry of anguish,
Like the last dying wail
Of some dumb, hunted creature,
Is borne upon the gale:
Why does the Bridegroom shudder
And turn so deathly pale?

Near Purgatory's entrance
The radiant Angels wait;
It was the great St. Michael
Who closed that gloomy gate,
When the poor wandering spirit
Came back to meet her fate.

"Pass on," thus spoke the Angel:
"Heaven's joy is deep and vast;
Pass on, pass on, poor Spirit,
For Heaven is yours at last;
In that one minute's anguish
Your thousand years have passed."

MODERN FEMALE DRESS.

A MELANCHOLY reflection suggests itself to every one who studies the history of costume. How little has been done by the progress of time, the cultivation of letters, and the advance of civilization, to elevate the habited man above the naked savage! But more melancholy still is another suggestion which a consideration of this subject supplies. How much less has been done by civilization (including tea-parties and balls, and missionary meetings) to raise the character of the dress worn by ladies of the most polished European capitals above that of garments which most please the Indian squaw or the Tahitian nymph! The Seminole chieftain perhaps never imagined anything as unpoetical as the chimney-pot hat of the present day; and the Seneca Indian, in the days of his savage innocence, would have laughed to scorn the prosaic anti-climax of the swallow-tailed coat. The facile compliance, however, which South African negroes have exhibited for confronting men and angels in a suit composed of a cocked-hat and Wellington boots is a painful evidence of the corrupting influence of the white man. Yet no white woman, so far as we know, has yet infected the primitive simplicity of pagan barbarism with the fantastic conceits of European fashion. We may be interrupted by the reminder that negro women in the Southern States of America and the British West Indies have adopted, with a zeal which almost seems intended to discredit, the most cumbrous absurdities of European attire—that they swell and swim in crinolines of the most gigantic expansion, that they hang festoons of paltry paper flowers on wool which will not develop into hair, and variegate the sombre eminence of their wrinkled heads by shabby caricatures of Parisian bonnets. This is true. But it is only since they became members of a Christian conventicle that the negresses have learnt to vie with their co-religionists in England. And, for aught we know, it may be some recondite policy of the Baptist persuasion which encourages them to travesty a mode of dress of which the absurdity cannot be appreciated till it is seen floating on the ample dimensions of a negro Venus. With this deduction, we repeat that the races which suburban lecturers complacently nickname savage exhibit a taste and simplicity of dress which put to shame the ambitious elaboration of London and Parisian milliners. We cannot, indeed, recommend an exact and literal adaptation of the fashions affected by the ladies of the African forest or the Otaheitan beach. While we hesitate to aver that they are less decent or less innocent than those which greet the eye from a drawing-room staircase, we have no hesitation in asserting that their special aptitude for a climate resembling that in which Eve first designed her light and simple garb forbids their introduction into London society. We regret this, for the juxtaposition of the two styles—that of barbarism and that of civilization—might be studied by the respective amateurs of each, to the mutual advantage of both. For instance, though the African or South Sea belle might have nothing to contrast with the hoop and the stomacher of her European compeer—except, indeed, the contrast which entire absence affords—she might offer valuable hints as to the form of a bracelet of shells or an armlet of bones. For the judgment which regulates the style and disposition of ornaments of a more splendid kind, our modern belles might be advantageously advised to study the grace with which a Hindoo girl assorts and wears her gold and silver bangles, were it not that the envy which would be inevitably inspired by the contemplation must prove fatal to the equanimity expected from every lady of quality. But, apart from the Hindoo type of fashion, there is much to be admired in the way in which every barbarian lady arranges her toilet. Her colors are, for the most part, not less pleasing or less natural in effect than those which disguise the faces of some modern votaries of fashion. Her feathers are about as gaudy and garish as those of a lady in Mayfair—neither more nor less so; her jewels may not be as costly, but they are as becoming, as significant, and as much in keeping as the heirlooms of a French or English great lady; and they have not been the ruin of any one. The drapery of the pagan is less ample than that of the Christian dame, but it is less hypocritical and less expensive. It conceals fewer blemishes, it stimulates fewer graces; it suggests less the purpose of imposture, and testifies less to a ruined husband or despairing milliner. Even if the headgear recalls to the antiquarian mind the far-fetched monstrosities which made hideous the ladies of the early Plantagenet Court, the skirt—unconscious of farthingale or hoop—gives to the eye the vision of those ample charms which, in our civilized assemblies, owe their impressiveness to the mechanician's art. The Hotteutot Venus, if she cannot boast of the amplitude of her milliner's bills or her sweeping train, has at any rate natural graces to show which no complication of steel and whalebone can emulate or supersede.

If appropriateness is the general characteristic of what we term barbarian costume, inappropriateness must be allowed to be the special characteristic of civilized dress. It is perhaps hardly possible to trace this divergence from common sense to its first causes. It may be that in the early Norman period, in the days of the Plantagenets, and again in the days of the Tudors, there lived arrogant and domineering dressmakers who looked on their fellow beings as dolls created for the express purpose of being dressed, and forced their customers to encase their bodies in garments framed, not according to the will of the wearer, but of the maker. It may be that to the continuance of this tyranny were due the "gorget" of the time of Edward II., the "horned head-dress" of Henry V., and the ruffs and farthingales of Queen Elizabeth, as likewise the hoop petticoats of the first Georgian period. This despotism seems fated to be permanent and persistent in its defiance of reason. Whatever may be the extravagance of dress on social occasions, and whatever inconvenience fine ladies and gentlemen may choose to inflict on one another when they crowd together for the purposes of social intercourse, the ordinary costumes of everyday life, at any rate, ought to be simple, easy, and convenient. It ought to be consistent with the power of locomotion and the performance of household duties. How far this can be predicated of female dress at the present day, we leave to the judgment of those who are daily jostled off the pavement by the keen steel hoops of pushing Amazons, or whose eyes are occasionally refreshed by the sight of a full-hooped housemaid kneeling on the stairs.

Indeed, putting aside all other considerations, it becomes a question of moment whether the crinoline movement be not a very partially-disguised portion of the systematic policy pursued by the champions of women's rights. While strong-minded women and feeble-minded men are twaddling on the abstract dogma of woman's equality, woman has quietly achieved for herself the prize of superiority. Whoever doubts this has only to make the helpless attempt to keep his own on a narrow pavement against the invasion of a steel-bound petticoat, or to avoid the charge of a brawny nursemaid, with expansive whalebone, piloting a suburban perambulator. A still severer trial of strength awaits the man who, nervous and unpunctual, edges his dangerous way amid the serried phalanx of evening dresses in the stalls of theatre or concert-room, or seeks to insinuate himself across the compact ranks that block access to the remotest corner of a favorite pew. In the streets, in the parks, in the theatre, and in the church—everywhere we see the outward and unmistakeable signs of female domination. And it is with but imperfect satisfaction that a man finds his devotions in church interrupted by the penitential responses of the sex which has not only impinged his ribs and half buried himself in its voluminous cloud of muslin and taffeta, but has made him responsible for the cost of the weapons which destroy his peace of body and of mind. It seems, indeed, the spirit of the most ruthless irony which extorts from a bevy of women floating in gauze or oscillating in velvet, with bonnets nodding in conscious oddity, the confession that they are withered like grass and forget to eat their bread; though perhaps a cynical observer, looking at the general appearance of a fashionable congregation, might be disposed to admit the sincerity of the penitential confession that they are become like pelicans in the wilderness and owls in the desert.

Of course it is utterly useless to inveigh against the present fashions on the score of extravagance or bad taste. The expensiveness, like every other sin, gives a peculiar piquancy to the indulgence. And how many women have the courage to countermand "ruches," "insertions," and flounces, and the innumerable superfluities by which a dress is made more barbarous and more costly when the milliner's forewoman simpers out the sneering comment, "That's so common?" And as for taste, why taste in dress has gone through every possible revolution in the course of ages, with one general effect. Whether the dresses have been high or low, whether they have expanded like ostriches' wings behind or been tightened like a sack about the neck, whether they have been surmounted by "horns," by "frizzles," by powder, or by curls—in all cases the pretty women have continued to look pretty and the plain women more or less plain. But there is another part of the question to which some women will perhaps give their attention. Is the dress quite decent? Do fine ladies ever happen to hear the criticisms of their own footmen on the exposure which the use of crinoline makes almost normal? If they did, we can hardly believe that they would persist in submitting not only themselves but their daughters to a kind of comment which was once thought to be reserved for the more blasé frequenters of the Opera, when expressing their admiration of the least modest of ballet-girls. And perhaps some women will not be indifferent to the reflection that the fashions which they set travel downwards with an increasing momentum of evil. If my lady wears crinoline in her drawing-room, Sally will wear crinoline in her still-room or dairy. What my lady does must be right in principle. And if my lady looks better in hoops, Sally thinks she will look better too. Besides, dress is the adjuster of female inequality. All women cannot have titles, parks, and Opera-boxes; but all women can have crinolines. My lady may vary the dimensions of hers from the narrowest propriety to the most gorgeous expansiveness of Court splendor. But this poor Sally regards as purely accidental, and not as touching the root of the matter. The big hoops are the grandest, and the big hoops she will use, even for the commonest occasions. Unfortunately big hoops require a proportional superstructure of silks and petticoats. These, too, the housemaid or dairymaid may get. The extent to which she does get them may be seen on any Sunday evening between nine and ten o'clock. The manner in which she does get them we do not see; though, perhaps, any mistress of a family might calculate with approximate precision the adequacy of her maid's wages to purchase the contents of her clothes-box. But this subject is a delicate one, and we forbear to pursue it.—Saturday Review.

THE BEAU-MONDE AND DEMI-MONDE IN PARIS.

THE Paris journals lately surprised their French, and startled their foreign readers, by an announcement for which, after all, both should have been prepared. No one who is at all conversant with the ordinary course of Parisian life—we do not say familiar with its inner mysteries—ought to have been astonished at hearing that certain grandes dames of French society had sought for invitations to a masked ball which was to be given by a distinguished leader of the demi-monde. We have had, in our country, certain faint and partial indications of the same curiosity, revealed in an awkward and half-hesitating sort of way. English great ladies once made an off-night for themselves at Cremorne, in order to catch a flying and furtive glance, not of the normal idols of those gay gardens, but of the mere scenic accessories to their attractions and triumphs. But as yet we have never heard that the matrons of English society have sought an introduction to the Lais of Brompton or the Phryne of May-fair, even under the decorous concealment of mask and domino. Nor has it yet been formally advertised here that the motive of so unusual a request was a desire to learn the arts and tactics by which the gilded youth—and, it might be added, the gilded age—of the country is subjected to the thrall of venal and meretricious beauty.

That such a rumor should be circulated and believed in France is—to use the current slang—"highly suggestive." It suggests a contrast of the strongest, though it is far from pleasing, kind between the society of to-day and the society of other days. It was long the special boast of the French that with them women enjoyed an influence which in no other part of the world was accorded to their sex, and that this influence was at least as much due to their mental as to their physical charms. The women of other nations may have been more beautiful. To the Frenchwoman was specially given the power of fascination; and it was the peculiar characteristic of her fascination that its exercise involved no discredit to the sense or the sensibility of the men who yielded to it. A power which showed itself as much in the brilliance of bon mots and repartee as in smiles and glances, a grace of language and expression which enhanced every grace of feature and of attitude, a logic which played in the form of epigram, and a self-respect which was set off rather than concealed by the maintenance of the most uniform courtesy to others—such were the arts and insignia of the empire which the most celebrated Frenchwomen, from the days of Maintenon and De Sevigne to those of Madame Deffand and Madame Roland or those of Madame Recamier, exercised over the warriors, sages, and statesmen of France. The homage paid by the men to the brilliant women who charmed the society which they had helped to create may not always have been perfectly disinterested. The friendship of the women for their illustrious admirers may not always have been perfectly Platonic. There may have been some impropriety—or, as our more Puritan friends would say, some sin—in the intercourse of some of the most celebrated Frenchmen and Frenchwomen. Yet even this could not have been predicated of all. Madame de Sevigne's reputation comes out clear and spotless even from the foulest assault of wounded vanity and slighted love. We do not forget the comprehensive loves and deliberate inconstancy of Ninon. But Ninon, corrupt as she may have been, was not venal. She did not ruin her lovers by her covetousness, and then receive their wives and sisters in her salons. She was courted by elegant and virtuous women, because she was the single and solitary instance as yet known of women possessing every grace and charm save the grace and charm of virtue. Whatever may have been the relations between the sexes in those days, it was at least free from grossness. The charms which attracted men to the Maison Rambouillet were not those of sense alone, or in a special degree. They were those of conversation at once spirited, graceful, elegant, and vivacious. To an accomplished man there is perhaps no greater social treat than to hear good French spoken by an educated and clever Frenchwoman. In her hands a language of which both the excellences and the defects eminently qualify it for the purposes of conversational combat, becomes a weapon of dazzling fence. Those delicate turns of phrase which imply so much more than they express, fly like Parthian shafts, and the little commonplaces which may mean nothing do what the pawns do when manipulated by a clever chess-player—everything. And in the age when the empire of Frenchwomen rested upon their grace and power in conversation, there was ample matter to task their remarkable talents. It was an age of new ideas. Government, religion, and philosophy; the administration of the kingdom and the administration of the universe; the rights of kings to be obeyed by their people and the right of the Creator to the adoration of his creatures; the claims of privilege and the claims of prerogative; the pretensions of rank and the pretensions of the roturier; the conflicts of science and theology—all these furnished materials for the tongues of the clever women, materials of which the clever women availed themselves. The final result was not, indeed, wholly satisfactory. How many a short sharp sarcasm, shot from the tongue of brilliant causeuses, rebounded on the gilded rooms wherein it first hurtled! How many a satire, sugared with compliment, at which rival beaux chuckled in delight, came back with its uncovered venom to the hearts of those whose admiration had first provoked it! How many a gibe of reckless truth, aimed at courts and nobles, distilled through laquais and waiting-maids into the streets of Paris, to whet the after-wrath of that fierce canaille! Many of those clever women had better been silent; many of those pungent epigrams, had better been unsaid. Still while the spirited talk went on, life was illumined by no common brilliance; and vice not only decked itself, but forgot itself, in the guise of intelligence and wit.

But what a change is it now! There are drawing-rooms in Paris which are more brilliant and gorgeous than any that De Sevigne or Recamier ever sat in. But their brilliance and splendor are not of such airy impalpabilities as genius or wit. They are solid, substantial, tangible. They are the brilliance and the splendor, not of able men and clever women, but of the upholsterer, the mechanician, and the decorator. There is gold, there is marble, there is lapis lazuli; there are pictures, statues, ormolu-clocks; there are rich velvets and cloud-like lace, and a blaze of amethysts, rubies, and diamonds. There are trains of Imperial dimensions and tiaras of Imperial brightness. And in whose honor is all this grand display? To whom is the court paid by this mob of sombre-clad and neatly-gloved men of every age, from twenty to sixty? Who have taken the place of the great female leaders of society whose names have added lustre to France? Strange as it may seem, their successors are second-rate or third-rate actresses, opera-dancers, and singers at public rooms and public gardens. We do not intend to undertake the superfluous task of penning a moral diatribe, or inveighing against the immorality of the age. Sermons there are, and will be, in abundance on so prolific and provoking a theme. In every age actresses and ballet-girls have had their admirers. In every age, probably, they will continue to have admirers. But what is worthy of note is this. Formerly this admiration was of an esoteric kind. The worshippers adored their divinities in secret. The temples of the goddesses were, at any rate, not obtruded on the public eye, nor in possession of the most open, public, and splendid streets. But now all this is changed; the fanes of the divinities are splendid and in the most splendid streets. The worshippers are of every age, and are all equally indifferent to secrecy. There is no restriction and no exclusion, save on two grounds—those of poverty and intelligence. There is a kind of intellect admitted into this gorgeous coterie, but it is intellect in livery. The dramatic author and the dramatic critic are now as much appendages to the dramatic courtezan as her coachman and her femme de chambre. Where professional reputation depends on scenic effect, and scenic effect depends upon the equivoques put into the actress's mouth, and the applause with which their delivery is received, the man who concocts the equivoques and the man who criticizes their delivery become equally objects of attention to the actress who is looking out for a clientele. Saving these necessary exceptions, these assemblies are composed of rich old men anxious to dissipate the money which they have made, and rich young men as anxious to dissipate the wealth which they have inherited. And now we hear that the wives and sisters of these men seek admission to these Paphian halls.

It is, indeed, not an unnatural, though it is far from decent curiosity which prompts ladies entitled to the reputation of virtue to examine something of the life and domestic economy of those ladies whose very existence presupposes an entire repudiation of virtue. The married women naturally desire to know something of the manners and mien and language of the rivals whose arts have diverted their own husbands' treasures into alien and obnoxious channels. When a wife hears that her husband has, at one magnificent stroke on the Bourse, carried off one or two millions of francs, she is curious to ascertain the process by which no inconsiderable proportion of these winnings has been "affected" to the payment of Madlle. Theodorine's debts or to the purchase of Madlle. Valentine's brougham. And the anxious mother, who has long dreamed of the ceremony which might unite the fortunes of her dear Alcide with the dot of her opulent neighbor's daughter, is tortured between the misery of frustrated hopes and curiosity to understand the motives which impel Alcide to become the daily visitor of Madlle. Gabrielle in the Rue d'Arcade, and her daily companion when riding in the Bois de Boulogne. Certainly the subject is a very curious one. But does the solution of the problem quite justify the means taken to solve it? Might not enough be inferred from the antecedent history of those who are the subjects of it to dispense with the necessity of a nearer examination? Take a number of women of the lower classes from the different provinces of France—with no refinement, with a mere shred of education, and with but small claim to what an English eye would regard as beauty—but compensating for lack of knowledge, education, and refinement by a vivacity and a coquetry peculiarly French. Take these women up to Paris, tutor them as stage supernumeraries, and parade before them the example of the arts of the more successful Lorettes. The rest may be imagined. From these general premises it is not difficult to conjecture the product obtained; to conceive that manner on which jeunes gens dote, a manner made up of impudence and grimace; that repartee which mainly consists of a new slang hardly known two miles beyond the Madeleine; those doubles entendres of which perhaps memory is less the parent than instinct, and that flattery which is always coarse and always venal. It would be erroneous to say that we have here given a complete picture of the class which certain leaders of Parisian fashion wish to study. There are, in the original, traits and features which we could not describe, and which it is unnecessary for us to attempt to describe, as they are portrayed in the pages of the satirist who has immortalized the vices of the most corrupt city at its most corrupt era. Juvenal will supply what is wanting to our imperfect delineation. English ladies may read him in the vigorous paraphrases of Dryden and Gifford; while their French contemporaries may arrive at a livelier conception of what we dare not express, if only they stay till the supper crowns the festal scene of the masked ball. If they outstay this, they will have learned a lesson the value of which we leave it for themselves to compute.

It is idle to say that curiosity of this kind is harmless because it is confined to a few. Only a few, indeed, may have contemplated the extreme step of being present at the Saturnalia of the demi-monde. But how many others have thought of them and talked of them? To how many leaders of society are the doings of these women the subjects of daily curiosity and daily conversation? How many patrician—or, at all events, noble—dames, regular attendants at mass, arbiters of fashion, and ornaments of the Church, honor with their inquisitiveness women of whose existence, twenty years ago, no decent Frenchwoman was presumed to have any knowledge? And do these noble ladies suppose that this curiosity is disregarded by the adventuresses from Arles or Strasburg, Bordeaux or Rouen, whom successful prostitution has dowered with lace, diamonds, carriages, and opera-boxes? Do they suppose that the professed admiration of the young Sardanapali for the ex-couturieres and ballet-girls of Paris has not a more potent effect when combined with the ill concealed interest of their mothers and sisters? And what that effect is on the men in one class, and on the women in another, a very slight knowledge of human nature is sufficient to suggest. That girls of moderately good looks will contentedly continue to ply the shuttle at Lyons, or to drudge as household servants in Brittany, or to trudge home to a supperless chamber in Paris with the bare earnings of a supernumerary or a coryphee at a small theatre, when a mere sacrifice of chastity may enable them not only to ruin young dukes and counts, but to become the theme and admiration of duchesses and countesses, is a supposition which involves too high a belief in human virtue; and the conditions we have named are found to be fatal to the virtue of the poorer French women. And as for the men, what must be the effect on them? Debarred from the stirring conflict of politics; exiled, so to speak, from the natural arena of patriotic ambition; knowing no literature save that of novels in which courtezans are the heroines, and caring for no society but that of which courtezans are the leaders; diversifying the excitement of the hazard-tables and the betting-room with the excitement of the coulisses; learning from their habitual associations to lose that reverence for women and that courteous attention to them which are popularly supposed to have at one time characterized the gentlemen of France—they partially redeem the degredation which they court by showing that even a mixture of vapid frivolity, sensual indulgence, and senseless extravaganco is insufficient to corrupt a nation, unless also the female leaders of society conspire to select for their notice and admiration those creatures for whom the law of the land would better have provided the supervision of the police and the certificate of professional prostitution. When virtuous women of birth and position rub shoulders with strumpets, protests are useless and prophecies are superfluous; for the taint which goes before destruction is already poisoning the heart of the nation.

AWKWARD OMISSION.—Paris gossip lets off a rich joke on the distinguished gentleman, M. Emile de Girardin, who recently gave a dinner in Paris to Abd-el-Kader, and during the conversation said, "I shall be happy to present you with my Two Sisters," meaning his new play. In translating, the explanation that it was M. Girardin's play was left out, and the Emir politely replied that "he would be very happy to accept the ladies, although his harem was quite full."

MATRIMONIAL PROPOSALS.

OUT of all the probable marriages, actual marriages, and breaches of promise of marriage talked of, it is curious how seldom any accurate information respecting offers of marriage reaches the ears of society. Is it that in such a delicate matter each one is afraid to pass the story on to his neighbor, lest he should be supposed, however innocent, to be personally implicated? Selden tells us that of all the actions of a man's life, his marriage least concerns other people, yet of all actions of our life, it is most meddled with by other people; perhaps mankind tacitly covenants not to meddle with the proposal by way of compensation for the eagerness with which they canvass the marriage. At any rate it is a merciful condescension on their part. We will accept it gratefully, for it is an insult to socieiy to suppose that it is not well informed on proposals as a general rule, and could make things very uncomfortable for lovers, if it chose. A proposal on this view is to the engagement what the honeymoon is to wedded life, the halting but necessary prelude which, by general consent, nobody listens to, before the full notes of the performer challenge attention.

It may be doubted, however, whether the fact that men are not so talkative on this as on other subjects may not arise from an uneasy consciousness that in their own case they rather made fools of themselves. We do not for a moment mean that they repent of their choice; if we did, it is to be hoped that no indignant wife would read a word further. But, speaking generally, proposals come snddenly. Most men have arranged their proposal long before, in their own minds, and rehearsed it often, till there shall be no chance of any blunder at the critical moment. It shall be done, they determine, at such and snch a time, in this manner rather than in that, en grand tenue or in a shooting-coat; there shall be no dropping on one or both knees as was usual in the last century, when our grandmothers were expected to faint as soon as their languishing "swain" (such was the term then in vogue) took out his pocket-handkerchief as a preliminary. The play-wrights have effectnally rnined this expedient; therefore a more natural occasion must be songht, which shall be, when the lady comes in from walking, say, or when she is riding. Some men even settle with themselves whether they shall take one of her hands, or whether it is better to seize both, in the transports of their declaration, and other little niceties of this kind, which those who have been in such a situation may be left to imagine for themselves. Ninety-nine times out of a hnndred this little scheme most egregiously fails. Chloris does not go out, as we expected, or bashfulness overpowered her Strephon, and the irrevocable moment slipped by. On the other hand, Ianthe sings one morning with snch exquisite taste, all by-standers being out of the way, that her enraptnred hearer proposes on the spot. A tear, an accident, a family affliction in the same way often precipitates the proposal, and the luckless planner is afterwards so disgusted at his own simplicity in devising such complicated means for so easy an end, that he is certain not to mention his experiences even to his dearest friend. Ungallant, too, though the suggestion may be, there may be added to this, in his thoughts, a spice of the feeling hinted at in the proverbs, "A burnt child dreads the fire," "Quem Deus vult perdere prius demeutat." These considerations will somewhat lessen onr wonder that the world knows so little of its proposals. We trust that in divulging them we are not vexing any of our sex, or rashly giving the other uew arms to use against our unhappy selves. It may be taken as an axiom, therefore, that just as the experience of all the decpest thinkers, from Plato onwards, confirms the old notion of love being involuntary, "at first sight," as we may say, so a proposal generally comes upon both parties to it unexpectedly. Some might suppose that the nobler sex herein were in evil case, that a dread domestic power impelled them onwards to their fate, independently of their volition. And this seems true to a certain extent; but the bachelor has safeguards at hand, if he has also enemies. Thus, the first steps towards his foes, the "overtures," as they are euphemistically termed, is always in his own power. The initiative is his. He need not wade into the fair-flowing river unless he chooses; but if he does, let him not complain if all at once he finds himself out of his depth. Again, he can write his proposal, if it seems good to him. This saves a world of trouble to bashful or fainthearted men, but it has many drawbacks. A story is told of a senior wrangler who dropped into a lonely parsonage, during a walking tour, fell in love with the host's daughter, and wrote his proposal to her. He wished her "good-by," like an ordinary mortal, aud when her father bade him farewell at the little station to which they had driven, he handed him the note, and requested him to deliver it on his return. The father consented, and put it in his pocket. For a year the mathematician heard nothing from his bride elect. Then judging that this passed even the ordinary habit of women to procrastinate, he made a point, on his tour during the vacation, once more to call at the parsonage. He was received as before, and not quite so warmly by the young lady as he anticipated. Her father, on being asked, did not know that the note was of much importance, and had forgotten to deliver it. The driving-coat was examined. There was the letter still in his pocket. Then, again, servants and post-mistresses have an ugly trick of reading letters. Secresy, too, is often rendered difficult even during the necessary deliberation of the lady, if the latter arrives at breakfast-time in a family circle. Except in extreme cases, proposals in writing are not to be recommended. They savor of cowardice. Better far stand up and meet your fate like a man. If we were empowered by the Court of Love to ascertain the feelings of the ladies on this point, there is no doubt but that, to a woman, they would prefer the rough and ready wooer who dashes straight into the proposal at once, flounders about a little, but finally passes the rubicon successfully, and on the other side awaits the decision of lips that ever smile on the brave. A man who proposes by letter deserves to lose his suit. It is far better to ask by a word of month.

"Excipiet blandas comita illa preces."

Another golden rule for those about to make a proposal is, Keep your own counsel; but if you must have an adviser, never consult a woman, unless your oracle sit on a tripod far removed from every mundane influence. The mortification of a refusal has an additional sting lent it, if it has to be afterwards communicated to the Mentor. Men who feel most, take their loss in silence. The brow may be smooth while the heart is a heap of ashes (Lesbia laughs, but it is so sometimes)—and the stricken affections love to suffer and writhe in unseen agony, as an animal seeks to die in the thickest covert. Videus (to tell a case in point, which is so business-like, it could only have happened to a widower) called at Florinda's house, aud was shown into the drawing-room. An aged aunt alone was at home, and to her he revealed the object of his coming—to make an offer of marriage to her niece. Soon Florinda entered, looking more charming than usual, and Videus made his proposal. "I am very sorry," said the lady, "but Velox has been beforehand, and has just asked me the same question. You are half an hour too late." Knowing what annts generally are, this one would have been more than mortal had she been reticent. Within a week the discomfiture of Videus was known through the country.

Some grave lovers are for making the proposals, in the first instance, to the parents—parent we should say, for Paterfamilias is always too glad to pass these things over to his wife. Doubtless it is a pleasing course for her self-importance when this procedure is observed; but in a case of such delicacy, premising that we speak with diffidence, it seems to us more important first to secure the consent of the principal. And this plan is more to the taste of the young lady in question, for then she has the pleasant task of enlightening her mother on the mystery when and how she likes, and can approach her with Agag-like gait, should such, unhappily, be needed. Our plan, we must confess, has invariably been on this principle, and we have seen no reason to regret it hitherto. Win the consent of the daughter, and she may safely be left to secure that of her parents. At all events (pardon such domestic Fenianism!) marriage is feasible as a dernier ressort without the mother's consent, but manifestly impossible if you have not the daughter's. This consideration appears to settle the vexed question of priority of proposals.

As was hinted above, society at large is very soon as well acquainted with the fact of the proposal having been made, as if the marriage-broker of Bokhara, or his western relative, the Bazvalan of Brittany had been intrusted with the negotiation: but for all that, a reasonable reticence should be observed by the lovers as to the manner in which it is made. That is their secret. It is generally the gentleman's fault if this be divulged; which may ensne from his choosing a wrong time and place for the ceremony; from the natural impulsiveness of his kind, as distinguished from the ready tact of women; or simply from the trifling fact that he speaks too loud. Thus a friend who was leaving the drawing room one day, in great glee as being an engaged man, was met by the servant in the passage with the remark, "I suppose, sir, you will not have to ring at the bell any more now." It may be, however, that she was innocent of listening at the door, as men in such a situation are apt to show their joy. Mercator, a portly Manchester man, having secured the hand of Sophia, rushed wildly into the dining-room, where her two married sisters were discreetly sitting, and having seized and embraced them both, exclaiming, "My dear sisters! Sophy is mine!" then, and then only, perceived that he had seriously alarmed Buttons, who was putting coal on the fire.

Amongst proposals are the matter-of-fact proposal; as when an honest agriculturist says, "I doesn't like beating about the bush; Nancy, will 'ee be my owld dumman?—do 'ee now!" Or as actually happened in the case of a man who taught at a girls' school, and had had all the romance taken out of him by hard work, "You stitch very nicely; would yon like to darn my stockings?" Readers will be glad to hear that he was accepted, and, after marriage, went back quietly from church to finish his lesson! Then there is the business-like proposal, often too familiarly exemplified in royal alliances, or noble marriages, where a title is balanced against wealth. We remember an amusing instance of it in a Cumberland clergyman, who made his proposal, and then slowly added, by way of clenching it, "I would have you consider before you say no, first, whether you ever had a proposal made to you before: secondly, whether it is likely you will ever again have one made to you." The lady appreciated the argument, and married him. It is a precedent, however, only to be recommended for general adoption in the case of ladies "of a certain age." We may exemplify the jocular proposal by the story of the man who, when dancing "Pop goes the weasel," at the time when that tune was so popular, asked his partner, "Will you pop through life with me?" Indeed, a ball-room would furnish many stories of proposals, for in no place are they more commonly made; contrary to the received notion, that hollow lanes or secluded groves are the places best suited to asking the all important question. Those who choose such localities as these to propose in, are the persons who fancy that marriage means love in a cottage; and the honeymoon, to sit like babes in the wood, or Mr. Millais's damsels, hand-in-hand in an apple orchard. A jocular proposal often serves to feel the way for a real one, or to cover the discomfiture of a refusal. Occasionally it only ministers to the vanity of the proposer, as when a man who simply means flirting proposes, and, on being tremblingly accepted, says, "Ah, you saucy puss! you would not have said yes if I had been in earnest." Such fellows, however, are generally careful that their victim has no brother. It is as well to answer their overtures in a similar strain, or to give an evasive reply—such, for instance, as has actually been said, "I can't make tea!"

As for the sentimental proposal, we must beg to be excused entering upon it: that is the business of the novel-writer rather than the essayist. Take up the next three-vol. novel you find with some such title as "Hearts and Loves," or "The Maid of Rosemount," and at least two instances of it will be discovered in each volume. So little is known, as a general rule, about proposals, and sensible people are so diffident in the matter, that they gladly fly to novels to see how the thing is done, just as silly people have recourse to a letter-writer to get ideas for love-letters. In a novel as on the stage, no proposal is taken which is not dramatic, thereby showing how untrustworthy novels are, as a rule, in depicting the events of ordiuary life. In real life, nothing is so uncommon as a romantic proposal. Even those who, with the most high-flown notions of courtship, intend their proposal to be a marvel of romance, are generally egregiously disappointed at the result. The most enterprising cavalier of this kind we have known, found himself compelled, by the force of circumstances, to turn carpet-knight and propose to his lady love on the hearth-rug; so close at all times is the prosaic to the sentimental. A man of this turn of mind may be well-matched with a fashionable young lady's idea of a lover:

Miss Racket.—"I want somebody that will sit by one at an opera, and dance with one at a ball, and call for one's carriage, and hand one out, and—".

Sir Dudley Dorimant.—"Lord, child, how much yon expect of a lover! Where could you get such antiquated ideas? I trust you are less exigeant upon the subject of husbands!"

Perhaps, after a ball-room, the hunting-field might be termed the most usual place for proposals. In both cases there is a whirl and an abandon apt to carry away the sternest resolves of bachelors. A man who has made up his mind to "crane" at no fences, finds his nerves in fitting order to face even a proposal. No time is more dangerous for lovers than the evening ride home through the quiet woodland ways, after a day when they have been witched with noble horsemanship.

The Basques have a sarcastic proverb, "The marriage-day is the morrow of good times;" it is the day of proposal which admits the "palmer in love's eye" to the full enjoyment of the engaged man's rights. They have a ludicrous side (which luckily the neophyte never sees for himself,) as in the room which must be given up to the happy pair to do their love-making in; the cares bestowed that the usual worries of a household do not disturb them; the atmosphere of roses and zephyrs which is so assidnously created for their delectation. Perhaps to the over-sensitive lover, engaged life has also something that at its best estate is jarring and ominous. Thus, one of our most amusing novelists speaks of him as being a victim, with an uneasy consciousness that all the petits soins showered so thickly upon him during this period are but the fillets and ribbons necessary for his graceful decoration preliminary to the marriage-day—the day of the great sacrifice. The cynic or the jester may decry the pleasures of an engagement; but we should ill repay the confidence of our readers, did we not hasten to assure them, from the plenitude of our experience, that engaged life is a very blissful period. It is the May of life, all flowers and sunshine, far removed from the winter of bachelordom, but with many an intimation of the long even days of wedlock's summer. We will conclude with a last rule for those who are anxions on the subject of our paper. Doubtless a stray sentence in it may have offended the finer tastes of the fair sex; in this, our last advice to their admirers, there is no fear but what once more we shall win their smiles; all who are thinking of proposing cannot do better than propose at once! Remember the noble motto of the gallant Montrose:

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch,
To gain or lose it all!"

WOMAN'S SHORTCOMINGS.

SHE has laughed as softly as if she sighed;
She has counted six, and over,
Of a purse well filled, and a heart well tried—
Oh, each a worthy lover!
They "give her time," for her soul must slip
Where the world has set its grooving;
She will lie to none with her fair red lip,
But love seeks truer loving.

She trembles her fan in a sweetness dumb,
As her thoughts were beyond recalling,
With a glance for one, and a glance for some,
From her eyelids rising and falling;
Speaks common words with a bashful air,
Hears bold words, unreproving;
But her silence says—what she never will swear,
And love seeks better loving.

Go, lady, lean to the light guitar,
And drop a smile to the bringer,
Then smile as sweetly, when he is far,
At the voice of an in-door singer;
Bask tenderly beneath tender eyes,
Glance lightly on their removing;
And join new words to old perjuries—
But dare not call it loving.

Unless you can think, when the song is done,
No other is soft in the rhythm;
Unless you can feel, when left by one,
That all men else go with him;
Unless you can know, when upraised by his breath,
That our beauty itself wants proving;
Unless you can swear, "For life, for death!"
Oh, fear to call it loving!

Unless you can muse in a crowd all day,
On the absent face that fixed you;
Unless you can love, as the angels may,
With the breadth of heaven betwixt you:
Unless you can dream that his faith is fast,
Through behoving and unbehoving;
Unless you can die, when the dream is past,
Oh, never call it loving! [Mrs. Browning.

THE GOLDEN LOAF.

THERE was a time when justice was very differently administered from the way in which it now is, and remote places were left long without the restraint or protection of the law. Although there were nominal authorities, the people were nearly free to follow their own devices; and when there was a show of bringing offenders to book and protecting the oppressed, the judge who ought to have done it was too often open to corruption, and allowed a bribe to influence him to an unrighteous decision.

During this time there was in a certain small town a baker, who had learned an important secret in the way of preparing bread. By means of it he succeeded in obtaining all the custom in the place; for his bread was so good that nobody could eat any other, having tasted it.

As his business increased he was compelled to have a foreman to help him; for the work was greater than he could manage. His wife, indeed, assisted him according to her strength, but that was not equal to his need; so he had recourse to a young man of good character, to whom he intrusted so much of his secret as fitted him to become his foreman and factotum.

He had not long made his arrangement when he became very ill and likely to die. In this state he summoned the foreman to his bedside, where his wife and children stood weeping around him.

"You know," he said, "I have done you good service for the service you have done me. I have paid you high wages, and you have fared as my own son would have done; moreover, I have taught you enough of my secret to make you an excellent baker, the first in the town, unless I sell the whole of my secret to another now, before I die, when, of course, your trade would be spoiled."

The foreman looked alarmed at the thought of this, but the baker went on:

"Now, though my trade has been so good, I am not rich, for I have always been liberal, as you know. I leave my wife with six children, whom she will find it hard to provide for; therefore I must do something to secure her enough money to put her in a way of bringing them up in credit and comfort. If you will give me fifty pieces of gold, you shall have the whole of my secret—you have the right to the first offer; but, if you will not, I must send for another man, who will be glad to do it, I know, for he has offered me that sum already."

The foreman declared his gratitude and willingness to pay the money, and entreated his dying master to believe that he would carefully watch the interests of his family, and never lose sight of what he owed to him.

"That is well," said the baker, "but pay the money, that I may tell you the secret at once, for my strength is failing."

The foreman began to deplore his fate that he did not possess five gold pieces, much less fifty; "but let me sign a paper," he said, "vowing that I will give the sum before six months are up, for I know I shall speedily gain the same, and I will live on herbs and water till I am free of the debt."

The honest baker, not suspecting that fraud and hypocrisy could lurk under such a fair face with such fine speech, consented, and a paper was drawn up promising not only the fifty pieces, but five more, for the six months' waiting, by the wish of the foreman, so anxious did he seem to do the right thing by his master's widow.

This paper was duly signed and sealed and delivered to the baker for his wife, before two witnesses; and then the good man told his whole secret of bread-making to his foreman.

He died very shortly afterwards, and the paper was given by him to his wife, with these words:

"I hope you will not only get this money, but that you will have secured a true and lasting friend in the foreman. If he should go from his word, however, which I cannot believe possible, God will right you; never lose your confidence in Him, nor put it too strongly in any man; only live in his fear, and He will protect you."

At first the poor widow was so distressed that she thought little of her affairs or the paper; her heart had been so much stricken by the loss of her excellent husband to entertain a thought of anything else; but as time wore on, and her children's prospects pressed upon her, she was forced to forget some of her grief, or rather to remember her duty as a mother.

When she came to bestir herself, she found that the foreman had made a false return of the goods left in the shop, and had paid her far less than they were worth. This alarmed her; and when she discovered further that the witnesses to the paper were men of bad character, who were known to be lawless and profligate, though they had passed for honest men, she was in great grief.

She waited till the six months were up, and then went to the foreman, who pretended to be quite surprised at her application; declared that it was all a fabrication about the agreement, that his signature had been forged, and that the two witnesses would swear they had never seen him put his hand to anything of the kind.

The poor widow, amazed at his wickedness, entreated him to remember the scene by her dying husband's bedside, and all the promises he had made there.

He told her she was crazy, or wanted to cheat him, and ordered his men to put her out of the shop, and shut the door.

"Nay, then," said she, "the judge will be here soon. I will lay my case before him, and God will see me righted."

The foreman laughed, for he knew the judge that was expected, and thought he could safely provide for him. As to the interference of Divine power in behalf of the widow, of course he did not fear that; for how should the wicked and unjust oppressor have any faith in a righteous and avenging God?

The widow went home to weep and to pray; the baker went home to triumph and to plot.

The day came for the judge's approach to the town. Every one expected the same that had given awards for some years past, the baker among the rest.

There was a great crowd by the gate through which he was to make his entrance, and among the foremost was the baker. To his vexation he heard that it was not the same that had been before; but he couldn't see him; the crowd was too great.

He was perplexed; he asked on one side and the other, "Do you know aught of the judge? what is he like? why is he come? what character has he?" but no one could satisfy him. The truth was, that the old judge had been taken ill on the road, and another of a different stamp had been appointed to supply his place.

The baker made his way to the judge's house, and there busied himself among the servants, to find out what kind of a man he had to deal with. While he was talking and asking, the judge passed through the hall in a plain dress, without anything to distinguish him from any ordinary person.

"Is that the judge's clerk?" asked the baker of one of the men in the hall. Before he could get an answer, the judge, who heard him stepped up and said, "Do you want anything with the judge's clerk?"

There was a keen look about the eye that rather put the baker into doubt as to how far he might trust the speaker. He hesitated a moment, but answered at last that he had a small matter to talk about.

"Come with me, then," said the judge; "I am the judge's clerk."

Now this was true; for he had left his clerk behind to manage matters in his absence, and was now his own clerk.

The baker, encouraged by his manner, followed him to a room, and then put down a loaf of bread.

"What may this be for?" asked the judge.

"It is a present for my lord the judge," replied the baker.

"Why do you make it?" asked the judge.

"Because I wish him to be as good a judge as our last was," said the baker.

"How good was he?" asked the judge.

"So good that he never suffered his friends to get into trouble," said the baker.

"And am I to give him this loaf?" asked the judge.

"If," said the baker—"if it is safe to do it; but you understand that heavy bread does not suit all stomachs?"

"Truly so," said the judge; "but his lordship has a stout stomach, and can digest heavy bread."

"That is good," said the baker; "then I warrant that my golden loaf will do good both to him and to me."

"No doubt of that," said the judge; "but will you not give me a small roll, at any rate, for presenting it?"

"That will I!" cried the baker, "if you will stand my friend against a troublesome widow that wants to get fifty-five gold pieces out of my pocket."

"Let me have the roll," said the judge, holding out his hand. The baker immediately produced it.

"Is it a golden roll? I can do as well with heavy bread as my lord," said the judge.

"It is a golden roll," said the baker; "and now you think I may be sure of the judge?"

"As sure as you are of me," said the judge; "but just tell your case, that I may know how to advise his lordship."

The next morning the court opened, and several cases were tried; the baker did not appear till he had finished his morning batches of bread, for he had been told that his business would not be attended to early.

When he got to the court he found the widow with her six children standing there with her paper in her hand.

The judge had a dress on, with a curious sort of cap that greatly disguised him, so that from a distance the baker didn't know him again.

He waited impatiently till his name was called, with that of the widow.

"Here, my lord!" he said, with great boldness.

"Here, my lord!" said the poor woman, feebly.

"Before I hear this case," said the judge, "I think it well to read the regulations for the court, which I am told have been somewhat neglected here of late."

Whereupon he began, and, among other things, read that if any person were convicted of bribing a judge, he should be put into the pillory, pay a heavy fine, and be imprisoned for a year.

The baker was surprised to hear this, and began to look more attentively at the judge. But the judge did not seem to notice him. He listened to the case; and when the widow had told her story and produced the paper, and the baker had sworn it was not his signature, and the two witnesses had done the same, he gave judgment in favor of the baker, saying at the same time to the widow: "There is no proof to disprove the words of these men. I am sorry for you. Can you eat heavy bread? because if you can, I will give you a loaf that may serve for a meal, which yonder honest baker brought to me last evening; and here is a roll of the same, that he was so thoughtful as to give to my clerk; you may let your children have it."

So saying, he produced the loaf and the roll.

"My conscience would not have allowed me to take a bribe more costly," he added; "for I must then have put the good man in the pillory, and fined and imprisoned him, but I could not refuse a loaf of bread."

"My lord, my lord! I would rather than a gold piece that I had my loaf and my roll back again," said the baker, much alarmed and agitated.

"Nay," said the judge, looking steadily at him, "I cannot sell my loaf for one gold piece; I will rather give it to the widow."

The baker could not bear the thought of her having it in her power to expose him to the penalty of the law, and entreated the judge to let him have back his loaf at any price.

"Any price?" said the judge; "very well, then; bring me fifty-five gold pieces for the loaf, and ten more for the roll, and then thou shalt have them back."

The baker ran back to his house and returned with all speed, bemoaning his fate that he should have been so grievously outwitted.

When he brought the money into court, the judge called the widow and paid it over to her. "There," said he, "that will do you more good than this rogue's heavy bread. I have heard of your faith and your patience, and now you see the end of them. As for you," he said to the baker, "it would serve you right if I made you pay dearer still for your golden loaf; but I hope you will remember that there is something that is deeper than the deepest cunning, and higher than the highest inventions of sin, and that the trust this woman put in the God of the widow was of more avail to her than all your lying dishonesty and craft have proved to you."—Leisure Hour.

THE QUEEN'S REVENGE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

THE name of Gustavus Adolphus, the faithful Protestant, the great general, and the good king of Sweden, has been long since rendered familiar to English readers of history. We all know how this renowned warrior and monarch was beloved by his soldiers and subjects, how successfully he fought through a long and terrible war, and how nobly he died on the field of battle. With his death, however, the interest of the English reader in Swedish affairs seems to terminate. Those who have followed the narrative of his life carefully to the end, may remember that he left behind him an only child, a daughter named Christina. But of the character of this child, and of her extraordinary adventures after she grew to womanhood, the public in England is, for the most part, entirely ignorant. In the popular historal and romantic literature of France, Queen Christina is a notorious character. In the literature of this country she has, hitherto, been allowed but little chance of making her way to the notice of the world at large.

And yet, the life of this woman was in itself a romance. At six years old she was Queen of Sweden, with the famous Oxensteirn for guardian. This great and good man governed the kingdom in her name until she had lived through her minority. Four years after her coronation she, of her own accord, abdicated her rights in favor of her cousin, Charles Gustavus. Young and beautiful, the most learned and most accomplished woman of her time, she resolutely turned her back on the throne of her inheritance, and set forth to wander through civilized Europe in the character of an independent traveller who was resolved to see all varieties of men and manners, to collect all the knowledge which the widest experience could give her, and to measure her mind boldly against the greatest minds of the age.

So far, the interest excited by her character and her adventures is of the most picturesquely-attractive kind. There is something strikingly new in the spectacle of a young queen who prefers the pursuit of knowledge to the possession of a throne, and who barters a royal birthright for the privilege of being free. Unhappily, the portrait of Christina cannot be painted throughout in bright colors only. It must be recorded to her disgrace that, when her travels brought her to Rome, she abandoned the religion for which her father fought and died. And it must be admitted in the interests of truth, that she freed herself from other restraints beside the restraint of royalty. Mentally distinguished by her capacities, she was morally degraded by her vices and her crimes.

The events in the strange life of Christina, especially those connected with her actions in the character of Queen-Errant, present ample materials for a biography, which might be regarded in England as a new contribution to our historical literature. One among the many extraordinary adventures which marked the Queen's wandering career, may be related in these pages as an episode in the history of her life which is complete in itself. The events of which the narrative is composed throw light, in many ways, on the manners, habits and opinions of a past age; and they can, moreover, be presented in the remarkable words of an eye witness who beheld them two centuries ago.

The scene is the palace of Fontainebleau, the time is the close of the year sixteen hundred and fifty-seven, the persons are the wandering Queen Christina; her grand equerry, the Marquis Monaldeschi; and Father Le Bel of the Convent of Fontainebleau, the witness whose testimony we are shortly about to cite.

Monaldeschi, as his name implies, was an Italian by birth. He was a handsome, accomplished man, refined in his manners, supple in his disposition, and possessed of the art of making himself eminently agreeable in the society of women. With these personal recommendations, he soon won his way to the favor of Queen Christina. Out of the long list of her lovers, not one of the many whom she encouraged caught so long and firm a hold of her capricious fancy as Monaldeschi. The intimacy between them probably took its rise, on her side at least, in as deep a sincerity of affection as it was in Christina's nature to feel. On the side of the Italian, the connection was prompted solely by ambition. As soon as he had reaped all the advantages of the position of chief favorite in the Queen's court, he wearied of his royal mistress, and addressed his attentions secretly to a young Roman lady, whose youth and beauty powerfully attracted him, and whose fatal influence over his actions ultimately led to his ruin and his death.

After endeavoring to ingratiate himself with the Roman lady, in various ways, Monaldeschi found that the surest means of winning her favor lay in satisfying her malicious curiosity on the subject of the secret frailties of Queen Christina. He was not a man to be troubled by any scrupulous feelings of honor when the interests of his own intrigues happened to be concerned; and he shamelessly took advantage of the position that he held towards Christina, to commit breaches of confidence of the most meanly infamous kind. Not contented with placing in the possession of the Roman lady the series of the Queen's letters to himself, containing secrets that she had revealed to him in the fullest confidence of his worthiness to be trusted, he wrote letters of his own to the new object of his addresses, in which he ridiculed Christina's fondness for him, and sarcastically described her smallest personal defects with a heartless effrontery which the most patient of women would have found it impossible to forgive. While he was thus privately betraying the confidence that had been reposed in him, he was publicly affecting the most unalterable attachment and the most sincere respect for the queen.

For some time this disgraceful deception proceeded successfully. But the hour of the discovery was at hand, and the instrument of effecting it was a certain cardinal who was desirous of supplanting Monaldeschi in the queen's favor. The priest contrived to get possession of the whole correspondence which had been privately confided to the Roman lady, including, besides Christina's letters, the letters which Monaldeschi had written in ridicule of his royal mistress. The whole collection of documents was enclosed by the cardinal in one packet, and was presented by him at a private audience, to the queen.

It is at this critical point of the story that the testimony of the eye-witness whom we propose to quote, begins. Father Le Bel was present at the terrible execution of the queen's vengeance on Monaldeschi, and was furnished with copies of the whole correspondence which had been abstracted from the Roman lady. Having been trusted with the secret he is wisely and honorably silent throughout his narrative on the subject of Monaldeschi's offence. Such particulars of the Italian's baseness and ingratitude as have been presented here, have been gathered from the contradictory reports which were current at the time, and which have been preserved by the old French collectors of historical anecdotes. The details of the extraordinary punishment of Monaldeschi's offence, which are now to follow, may be given in the words of Father Le Bel himself. The reader will understand that his narrative begins immediately after Christina's discovery of the perfidy of her favorite.

The sixth of November, sixteen hundred and fifty-seven (writes Father Le Bel,) at a quarter past nine in the morning, Queen Christina of Swedeu, being at that time lodged in the Royal Palace of Fontainebleau, sent one of her men servants to my convent, to obtain an interview with me. The messenger, on being admitted to my presence, inquired if I was the superior of the convent, and when I replied in the affirmative, informed me that I was expected to present myself immediately before the Queen of Sweden.

Fearful of keeping her majesty waiting, I followed the man at once to the palace, without waiting to take any of my brethren from the convent with me.

After a little delay in the ante-chamber, I was shown into the Queen's room.

She was alone; and I saw, by the expression of her face, as I respectfully begged to be favored with her commands, that something was wrong. She hesitated for a moment; and then told me, rather sharply, to follow her to a place where she might speak with the certainty of not being overheard. She led me into the Galerie des Cerfs, and, turning round on me suddenly, asked if we had ever met before. I informed her Majesty that I had once had the honor of presenting my respects to her; that she had received me graciously, and that there the interview had ended. She nodded her head and looked about her a little; then said, very abruptly, that I wore a dress (referring to my convent costume) which encouraged her to put perfect faith in my honor; and she desired me to promise beforehand that I would keep the secret with which she was about to entrust me as strictly as if I had heard it in the confessional. I answered, respectfully, that it was part of my sacred profession to be trusted with secrets; that I had never betrayed the private affairs of any one; and that I could answer for myself as worthy to be honored by the confidence of a queen.

Upon this, her Majesty handed me a packet of papers, sealed in three places, but having no superscription of any sort. She ordered me to keep it under lock and key, and to be prepared to give it back again before any person in whose presence she might see fit to ask me for it. She, further, charged me to remember the day, the hour, and the place in which she had given me the packet; and with that last piece of advice she dismissed me. I left her alone in the gallery, walking slowly away from me, with her head drooping on her bosom, and her mind, as well as I could presume to judge, perturbed by anxious thoughts.*

On Saturday, the tenth of November, at one o'clock in the afternoon, I was sent for to the Palace again. I took the packet out of my private cabinet, feeling that I might be asked for it; and then followed the messenger as before. This time he led me at once to the Galerie des Cerfs. The moment I entered it, he shut the door behind me with such extraordinary haste and violence, that I felt a little startled.

* Although Father Le Bel discreetly abstains from mentioning the fact, it seems clear from the context that he was permitted to read, and that he did read, the papers contained in the packet.

As soon as I recovered myself, I saw her Majesty standing in the middle of the gallery, talking to one of the gentlemen of her Court, who was generally known by the name of The Marquis, and whom I soon ascertained to be the Marquis Monaldeschi, Grand Equerry of the Queen of Sweden. I approached her Majesty and made my bow—then stood before her, waiting until she should think proper to address me.

With a stern look on her face, and with a loud, clear, steady voice, she asked me, before the Marquis and before three other men who were also in the gallery, for the packet which she had confided to my care.

As she made that demand, two of the three men moved back a few paces, while the third, the captain of her guard, advanced rather nearer to her. I handed her back the packet. She looked at it thoughtfully for a little while; then opened it, and took out the letters and written papers which it contained, handed them to the Marquis Monaldeschi, and insisted on his reading them. When he had obeyed, she asked him, with the same stern look and the same steady voice, whether he had any knowledge of the documents which he had just been reading. The Marquis turned deadly pale, and answered that he had now read the papers referred to for the first time.

"Do you deny all knowledge of them?" said the Queen. "Answer me plainly, sir. Yes or no?"

The Marquis turned paler still. "I deny all knowledge of them," he said, in faint tones, with his eyes on the ground.

"Do you deny all knowledge of these too?" said the Queen, suddenly producing a second packet of manuscript from under her dress, and thrusting it in the Marquis's face.

He started, drew back a little, and answered not a word. The packet which the Queen had given to me contained copies only. The original papers were those which she had just thrust in the Marquis's face.

"Do you deny your own seal and your own handwriting?" she asked.

He murmured a few words, acknowledging both the seal and the handwriting to be his own, and added some phrases of excuse, in which he endeavored to cast the blame that attached to the writing of the letters on the shoulders of other persons. While he was speaking, the three men in attendance on the Queen silently closed around him.

Her Majesty heard him to the end. "You are a traitor," she said, and turned her back on him.

The three men, as she spoke those words, drew their swords.

The Marquis heard the clash of the blades against the scabbards, and, looking quickly round, saw the drawn swords behind him. He caught the Queen by the arm immediately, and drew her away with him, first into one corner of the gallery, then into another, entreating her in the most moving terms to listen to him, and to believe in the sincerity of his repentance. The Queen let him go on talking without showing the least sign of anger or impatience. Her color never changed; the stern look never left her countenance. There was something awful in the clear, cold, deadly resolution which her eyes expressed while they rested on the Marquis's face.

At last she shook herself free from his grasp, still without betraying the slightest irritation. The three men with the drawn swords, who had followed the Marquis silently, as he led the Queen from corner to corner of the gallery, now closed round him again, as soon as he was left standing alone. There was perfect silence for a minute or more. Then the Queen addressed herself to me.

"Father le Bel," she said, "I charge you to bear witness that I treat this man with the strictest impartiality." She pointed, while she spoke, to the Marquis Monaldeschi with a little ebony riding-whip that she carried in her hand. "I offer that worthless traitor all the time he requires—more time than he has any right to ask for—to justify himself if he can."

The Marquis hearing these words, took some letters from a place of concealment in his dress, and gave them to the Queen, along with a small bunch of keys. He snatched these last from his pocket so quickly, that he drew out with them a few small silver coins which fell to the floor. As he addressed himself to the Queen again, she made a sign with her ebony riding-whip to the men with the drawn swords; and they retired toward one of the windows of the gallery. I, on my side, withdrew out of hearing. The conference which ensued between the Queen and the Marquis lasted nearly an hour. When it was over, her Majesty beckoned the men back again with the whip, and then approached the place where I was standing.

"Father le Bel," she said, in her clear, ringing, resolute tones, "there is no need for me to remain here any longer. I leave that man," she pointed to the Marquis again, "to your care. Do all that you can for the good of his soul. He has failed to justify himself, and I doom him to die."

If I had heard sentence pronounced against myself, I could hardly have been more terrified than I was when the Queen uttered these last words. The Marquis heard them where he was standing, and flung himself at her feet. I dropped on my knees by his side, and entreated her to pardon him, or, at least, to visit his offence with some milder punishment than the punishment of death.

"I have said the words," she answered, addressing herso ouly to me; "and no power under Heaven shall make me unsay them. Many a man has been broken alive on the wheel for offences which were innocence itself compared with the offence which this perjured traitor has committed against me. I have trusted him as I might have trusted a brother; he has infamously betrayed that trust; and I exercise my royal rights over the life of a traitor. Say no more to me. I tell you again, he is doomed to die."

With those words the Queen quitted the gallery, and left me alone with Monaldeschi and the three executioners, who were waiting to kill him.

The unhappy man dropped on his knees at my feet, imploring me to follow the Queen, and make one more effort to obtain his pardon. Before I could answer a word, the three men surrounded him, held the points of their swords to his sides—without, however, actually touching him—and angrily recommended him to make his confession to me, without wasting any more time. I entreated them, with the tears in my eyes, to wait as long as they could, so as to give the Queen time to reflect, and, perhaps, to falter in her deadly intentions toward the Marquis. I succeeded in producing such an impression on the chief of the three men, that he left us, to obtain an interview with the Queen, and to ascertain if there was any change in her purpose. After a short absence he came back, shaking his head.

"There is no hope for you," he said, addressing Monaldeschi. "Make your peace with Heaven. Prepare yourself to die!"

"Go to the Queen!" cried the Marquis, kneeling before me with clasped hands. "Go to the Queen yourself; make one more effort to save me! Oh, Father le Bel, run one more risk—venture one last entreaty—before you leave me to die!"

"Will you wait till I come back?" I said to the three men.

"We will wait," they answered, and lowered their sword-points to the ground.

I found the Queen alone in her room, without the slightest appearance of agitation in her face or her manner. Nothing that I could say had the slightest effect on her. I adjured her by all that religion holds most sacred, to remember that the noblest privilege of any sovereign is the privilege of granting mercy; that the first of Christian duties is the duty of forgiving. She heard me unmoved. Seeing that entreaties were thrown away, I ventured, at my own proper hazard, on reminding her that she was not now living in her own kingdom of Sweden, but that she was the guest of the King of France, and lodged in one of his own palaces; and I boldly asked her if she had calculated the possible consequences of authorizing the killing of one of her attendants inside the walls of Fontainebleau, without any preliminary form of trial, or any official notification of the offence that he had committed. She answered me coldly, that it was enough that she knew the unpardonable nature of the offence of which Monaldeschi had been guilty; that she stood in a perfectly independent position toward the King of France; that she was absolute mistress of her own actions, at all times and in all places; and that she was accountable to nobody under Heaven for her conduct toward her subjects and servants, over whose lives and liberties she possessed sovereign rights, which no consideration whatever should induce her to resign.

Fearful, as I was, of irritating her, I still ventured on reiterating my remonstrances. She cut them short by hastily signing to me to leave her.

As she dismissed me, I thought I saw a slight change pass over her face; and it occurred to me that she might not have been indisposed at that moment to grant some respite, if she could have done so without appearing to falter in her resolution, and without running the risk of letting Monaldeschi escape her. Before I passed the door, I attempted to take advantage of the disposition to relent which I fancied had perceived in her; but she angrily reiterated the gesture of dismissal before I had spoken half a dozen words. With a heavy heart, I yielded to necessity, and left her.

On returning to the gallery, I found the three men standing round the Marquis, with their sword-points on the floor, exactly as I had left them.

"Is he to live or to die?" they asked when I came in.

There was no need for me to reply in words; my face answered the question. The Marquis groaned heavily, but said nothing. I sat myself down on a stool, beckoned him to come to me, and begged him as well as my terror and wretchedness would let me, to think of repentance, and to prepare for another world. He began his confession kneeling at my feet, with his head on my knees. After continuing it for some time, he suddenly started to his feet with a scream of terror. I contrived to quiet him, and to fix his thoughts again on heavenly things. He completed his confession, speaking sometimes in Latin, sometimes in French, sometimes in Italian, according as he could best explain himself in the agitation which now possessed him.

Just as he had concluded, the Queen's chaplain entered the gallery. Without waiting to receive absolution, the unhappy Marquis rushed away from me to the chaplain, and, still clinging desperately to the hope of life, besought him to intercede with the Queen. The two talked together in low tones, holding each other by the hand. When their conference was over, the chaplain left the gallery again, taking with him the chief of the three executioners who were appointed to carry out the Queen's deadly purpose. After a short absence, this man returned without the chaplain. "Get your absolution," he said briefly to the Marquis, "and make up your mind to die."

Saying these words, he seized Monaldeschi, pressed him back against the wall at the end of the gallery, just under the picture of Saint Germain; and before I could interfere, or even turn aside from the sight, struck at the Marquis' right side with his sword. Monaldeschi caught the blade with his hand, cutting three of his fingers in the act. At the same moment, the point touched his side and glanced off. Upon this, the man who had struck at him exclaimed, "He has armor under his clothes," and, at the same moment, stabbed Monaldeschi in the face. As he received the wound, he turned round toward me, and cried out loudly, "Father le Bel! Father le Bel!"

I advanced toward him immediately. As I did so, the man who had wounded him retired a little, and signed to his two companions to withdraw also. The Marquis, with one knee on the ground, asked pardon of God, and said certain last words in my ear. I immediately gave him absolution, telling him that he must atone for his sins by suffering death, and that he must pardon those who were about to kill him. Having heard my words, he flung himself forward on the floor. While he was falling, one of the three executioners who had not assailed him as yet, struck at his head, and wounded him on the surface of the skull.

The Marquis sank on his face; then raised himself a little, and signed to the men to kill him outright, by striking him on the neck. The same man who had last wounded him, obeyed by cutting two or three times at his neck, without, however, doing him any great injury. For it was indeed true that he wore armor under his clothes, which armor consisted of a shirt of mail, weighing nine or ten pounds, and rising so high round his neck, inside his collar, as to defend it successfully from any chance blow with a sword.

Seeing this, I came forward to exhort the Marquis to bear his sufferings with patience, for the remission of his sins. While I was speaking, the chief of the three executioners advanced, and asked me if I did not think it was time to give Monaldeschi the finishing stroke. I pushed the man violently away from me, saying that I had no advice to offer on the matter, and telling him that if I had any orders to give, they would be for the sparing of the Marquis's life, and not for the hastening of his death. Hearing me speak in those terms, the man asked my pardon, and confessed that he had done wrong in addressing me on the subject at all.

He had hardly finished making his excuses to me, when the door of the gallery opened. The unhappy Marquis, hearing the sound, raised himself from the floor, and, seeing that the person who entered was the Queen's chaplain, dragged himself along the gallery, holding on by the tapestry that hung from the walls, until he reached the feet of the holy man. There, he whispered a few words (as if he was confessing) to the chaplain, who, after first asking my permission, gave him absolution, and then returned to the Queen.

As the chaplain closed the door, the man who had struck the Marquis on the neck, stabbed him adroitly with a long narrow sword in the throat, just above the edge of the shirt of mail. Monaldeschi sank on his right side, and spoke no more. For a quarter of an hour longer he still breathed, during which time I prayed by him, and exhorted him as I best could. When the bleeding from this last wound ceased, his life ceased with it. It was then a quarter to four o'clock. The death agony of the miserable man had lasted, from the time of the Queen's first pronouncing sentence on him, for nearly three hours.

I said the De Profundis over his body. While I was praying, the three men sheathed their swords, and the chief of them rifled the Marquis's pockets. Finding nothing on him but a prayer-book and a small knife, the chief beckoned to his companions, and they all three marched to the door in silence, went out, and left me alone with the corpse.

A few minutes afterward I followed them, to go and report what had happened to the Queen.

I thought her color changed a little when I told her that Monaldeschi was dead; but those cold, clear eyes of hers never softened, and her voice was still as steady and firm as when I first heard its tones on entering the gallery that day. She spoke very little, only saying to herself, "He is dead, and he deserved to die!" Then, turning to me, she added, "Father, I leave the care of burying him to you; and, for my own part, I will charge myself with the expense of having masses enough said for the repose of his soul." I ordered the body to be placed in a coffin, which I instructed the bearers to remove to the churchyard on a tumbril, in consequence of the great weight of the corpse, of the misty rain that was falling, and of the bad state of the roads. On Monday, the twelfth of November, at a quarter to six in the evening, the Marquis was buried in the parish church of Avon, near the font of holy water. The next day, the Queen sent one hundred livres, by two of her servants, for masses for the repose of his soul.

Thus ends the extraordinary narrative of Father Le Bel. It is satisfactory to record, as some evidence of the progress of humanity, that this barbarous murder, which would have passed unnoticed in the feudal times, as an ordinary and legitimate exercise of a sovereign's authority over a vassal, excited, in the middle of the seventeenth century, the utmost disgust and horror throughout Paris. The prime minister at that period, Cardinal Mazarin (by no means an over-scrupulous man, as all readers of French history know,) wrote officially to Christina, informing her that "a crime so atrocious as that which had just been committed under her sanction, in the Palace of Fontainebleau, must be considered as a sufficient cause for banishing the Queen of Sweden from the court and dominions of his sovereign, who, in common with every honest man in the kingdom, felt horrified at the lawless outrage which had just been committed on the soil of France."

To this letter Queen Christina sent the following answer, which, as a specimen of spiteful effrontery, has probably never been matched:

"Monsieur Mazarin.—Those who have communicated to you the details of the death of my equerry, Monaldeschi, knew nothing at all about it. I think it highly absurd that you should have compromised so many people for the sake of informing yourself about one simple fact. Such a proceeding on your part, ridiculous as it is, does not, however, much astonish me. What I am amazed at, is, that you and the king, your master, should have dared to express disapproval of what I have done.

"Understand, all of you—servants and masters, little people and great—that it was my sovereign pleasure to act as I did. I neither owe, nor render, an account of my actions to any one—least of all, to a bully like you.

* * * * * * *

"It may be well for you to know, and to report to any one whom you can get to listen to you, that Christina cares little for your court, and less still for you. When I want to revenge myself, I have no need of your formidable power to help me. My honor obliged me to act as I did; my will is my law, and you ought to know how to respect it. Understand, if you please, that wherever I choose to live, there I am Queen; and that the men about me, rascals as they may be, are better than you and the ragamuffins whom you keep in your service.

* * * * * * *

"Take my advice, Mazarin, and behave yourself for the future so as to merit my favor; you cannot, for your own sake, be too anxious to deserve it. Heaven preserve you from venturing on any more disparaging remarks about my conduct! I shall hear of them, if I am at the other end of the world, for I have friends and followers in my service who are as unscrupulous and as vigilant as any in yours, though it is probable enough that they are not quite so heavily bribed."

After replying to the prime minister of France in these terms, Christina was wise enough to leave the kingdom immediately.

For three years more, she pursued her travels. At the expiration of that time, her cousin, the King of Sweden, in whose favor she had abdicated, died. She returned at once to her own country, with the object of possessing herself once more of the royal power. Here the punishment of the merciless crime that she had sanctioned overtook her at last. The brave and honest people of Sweden refused to be governed by the woman who had ordered the murder of Monaldeschi, and who had forsaken the national religion for which her father had died. Threatened with the loss of her revenues as well as the loss of her sovereignty, if she remained in Sweden, the proud and merciless Christina yielded for the first time in her life. She resigned once more all right and title to the royal dignity, and left her native country for the last time. The final place of her retirement was Rome. She died there in the year sixteen hundred and eighty-nine. Even in the epitaph which she ordered to be placed on her tomb, the strange and daring character of the woman breaks out. The whole record of that wild and wicked existence, was summed up with stern brevity in this one line:

Christina Lived Seventy-two Years.

A carpenter, having neglected to make a gibbet, (which had been ordered by the executioner,) on the ground that he had not been paid for the last that he had erected, gave so much offence that the next time the judge came the circuit he was sent for. "Fellow," said the judge, in a stern voice, "how came you to neglect making the gibbet that was ordered on my account?" "I humbly beg your pardon," said the carpenter; "had I known that it had been for your lordship, it should have been done immediately."

A Loan.—A comedian lent a brother actor two shillings, and when he made a demand for the sum, the debtor turned peevishly from him, and said. "Hang it! I'll pay you to-day in some shape or other." Petersou good-humoredly replied, "I shall be much obliged to you, Tom, to let it be as much like two shillings as you can."

Sabbath Breaking.—A little girl, four years old, was on her way home from church with her father, when they passed a boy splitting wood, and the father remarked, "Mary, do you see that boy breaking the Sabbath?" The child made no reply, but walked home very thoughtfully, and meeting her mother, exclaimed, "Oh, mother, I saw a boy breaking the Sabbath with a big axe!"

THE PEACE PROCLAMATION.

As a corollary to his former action, President Johnson has issued a Proclamation declaring the rebellion at an end and peace restored through the whole length and breadth of this once more united country. This is eminently proper and just. For nearly a year the clash of arms has not been heard, and after four years of hard fighting it is time that we should begin to reap the substantial fruits of the Peace which has been conquered. If it was proper for President Lincoln to issue a proclamation declaring the existence of rebellion, it is certainly no less right that his successor in office should issue one declaring the rebellion at an end. That it is at an end even the most radical member of our most contumacious Congress will not deny. Are we to deal with a conquered foe as we might with a band of captured gorillas, chaining them in cages and displaying them to the world as a national exhibition? It is very well to talk of the Sepoy rebellion in India and instance the action of the British Government with the rebels as furnishing at once an example and a justification of the manner in which we should deal with the South. But the cases are scarcely parallel. The Southerners were never sepoys; before the war we held them dear as countrymen, and a constant interchange of courtesies was maintained. During the war they were accorded the rights of belligerents and not treated as rebels. Exchange of prisoners went on, treaties were made, and flags of truce received. Even the prisoners taken upon the high seas, waging war upon Northern commerce, were not hanged, though in the strict eye of the law they were to be esteemed as pirates. The fact was very soon made patent that it was impossible to deal with half a nation in arms as with a district or township in revolt, and even the most clamorous for extreme measures silenced their demands when reprisal was threatened, and their own relatives lay within reach of Southern scaffolds. Consistency may be a jewel, but, for all that, it must not be claimed that expediency is without value. And very often consistency may be defined as simply: The best thing that can be done under the circumstances. It being acknowledged that the South is conquered, the only question at issue is: Shall we provoke the conquered into sullenness, and perhaps lash them into fury, by ignominious treatment, or shall we conciliate them by a fair and judicious treatment, the magnanimity of which the bitterest among them cannot but acknowledge. Argument would seem unnecessary, but there are spirits on earth that could not be happy in heaven, did they see any with whom they had had a feud while in the flesh sharing in its beatitudes. President Johnson's policy is consistent—for it follows out to the letter every principle upon which the war has been conducted. It is expedient—for, what other course could be pursued with safety? And it will have the endorsement of nations and of history, however the zealots, whose vision is bounded only by the present, may howl upon his heels.

Arthur B. Stout, M. D., one of the oldest of our pioneers publishes An Essay on Public Education in California. We are indebted to the author for a copy. Called forth by the, Hager School Bill, it is still eminently worthy of perusal, though that famous agitation lies quietly tabled. Dr. Stout's plea for opening the fountains of a higher education than that which is bounded by the "three Rs," to those who wish to avail themselves of the waters, is direct and convincing. That the masses are in no danger of being over-educated is an unfortunate fact, patent to all. "How many mechanics," exclaims our author, "who will surprise you by their manual dexterity, can correctly write and spell the bill for their work? How many merchants know how to keep their own books? In the hour of distress they must call an expert to balance their accounts."

THE SPECTACULAR DRAMA.

When the gay and gorgeous Menken flashed across our theatrical horizon, dazzling the parquet, bewildering the dress circle, and delighting the galleries by the brilliancy and breadth of her flesh-colored tights, public opinion as to the propriety of the display was very much divided. Or, rather it was not divided at all; with singular unanimity it was decided that the exhibition was magnificently improper, and in this fact an explanation will at once be found of the immense success which attended the Pacific engagement of that eminent Advocate of Woman's Rights and Tights. For, as a natural result, when once it became fairly established, or at least generally understood, that the exhibition was improper, every one went to see it. As a natural result every one was disappointed, so far as seeing anything improper was concerned; but as a logical consequence of the pre-established conviction that something improper would eventually be developed, every one went again, so that the houses were crowded nightly, and the fortunate exponent of the spectacular and shapely reaped a harvest sufficiently rich to repay her for all the slashing criticism she had to encounter at the hands of those who assume the duty of correcting the public taste whenever it wanders into unusual channels. It is only justice to add that even in England, where overcoats and umbrellas are carried to the extreme, the Menken's costume was considered the correct thing, and even the Times, which has a reputation for doing the highly moral, never ventured to suggest a single addition to it. And in France, where these things are understood much better, the dress of "Mazeppa" was considered so cumbersome that the hero of the wild girdle race of that piece could no more have made a successful run in it than could one of our fire boys, "jerking" the rope of his favorite "masheen," and clad in the voluminous folds of the ancient Roman toga.

The success to which we have just alluded inaugurated the reign of the spectacular drama, and, with very brief interregnums, it has held sway upon our stage ever since. Lately our people have returned to their mutton in the shape of The Sheep's Foot, which, for something over two weeks past, has so successfully drawn at the Metropolitan. We by no means intend to institute a parallel between the above mentioned piéce de mouton and Mazeppe, but we apprehend that very few will contradict the assertion that the shapeliness of limb which "Don Guzman" neither denies nor disguises, has contributed, in no small degree, to nightly swelling the houses. Much as the popular fancy may be attracted by tricks and transformations, we venture to say that the best spectacular piece ever put upon the stage, without a ballet and a liberal display of extremities, would be left literally "without a leg to stand upon."

We have slightly wandered from the end at which we were aiming in the outset of this writing, but the reader will find a sufficient excuse for the digression when he remembers the extreme discursiveness of the subject.

In view of the favor which the spectacular drama finds with our public, we simply wished to show that the taste is not a depraved one, as is often claimed; that, on the contrary, it is perfectly natural and has its foundation in a condition of things peculiar to the country. That "climatic influences" have anything to do with it we do not contend, but that influences no less compelling and controlling lie at the bottom of all, we resolutely maintain. In the first place, the population runs to legs: the development of our youth in that particular being so wonderful as to attract the attention of strangers. Climbing the hills upon which our schools are located is the primal cause of a peculiarity which there is no need to point out to visitors, though the pride of parents often impels them to do so. Bowles remarked it, and devotes nearly a chapter of his book to a discussion of what seems to have been to him a physiological problem, though no traveller among us has ever noted, to our knowledge, that brain is developed in a corresponding degree. Again, there is so very little concealment of this boast of our people, especially among the ladies, that if any doubt ever existed as to whether the peculiarity to which we have so delicately alluded existed in fact or in fancy alone, it would surely have been dissipated since the introduction among us of those skilful contrivances for the looping up of dresses, born in the Quartier Breda, and at once adopted, like the latest thing in back-hair, upon our own Montgomery street. With such exhibitions of limb upon the street it is little to be wondered at that the stage follows the fashion so closely, and that audiences sit so impassively. Covered limbs would probably excite attention most unpleasantly.

Again we have slightly wandered from our subject, and again we must ask the reader to find an excuse for us in the wide range which the spectacular opens to speculation and fancy. This country of ours is eminently a workday one. Rushing, bustling, driving, from morning till night, busied with plans how to make money and how to keep it, our people need relaxation when evening comes. To sit through one of Shakspeare's tragedies or Sheridan's comedies would scarcely unbend the bow. On the contrary it would very probably string it up to a finer tension. And people must rest their brains occasionally—whether they have any or not. What better then than the spectacular piece, where there is neither plot nor moral, where the spectator has only to give himself up to the scenery, the music, the dancing, and the wonderful mutations to which everything becomes subject, enjoying an immense amount of Sardanapalism at a comparatively small expense? It is a kindred feeling of weariness of thought and a desire to get away from it which impels our people to patronize New York Ledgers and Waverly Magazines, and to visit melodeons and go out to the Willows, and do a great many other things which tax the pocket little and the mind less. Again we repeat that this thirst for the spectacular on the part of our population is a perfectly legitimate and healthy one, and one, moreover, which should be encouraged rather than repressed. Think of the overworked minds among us and the terrible consequences that would ensue had they no means of relief, "no place to go to" and cast off the burden of thought, giving themselves up to the illusions of the senses. Stockton would be filled to repletion, and Homes of the Inebriate would multiply until they stood on every corner. In view of such patent facts we call upon managers to cultivate the spectacular, to cling to the spectacular, and to shower the spectacular around us

> By his red cedar tree,
> And the red man's babe
> Leap beyond the sea.

For we have an idea that though the old generation may remain and be joyful, the younger one, belonging to a riper civilization, will evince considerable anxiety to get away.

AMUSEMENTS.

The grand fairy romance of The Enchanted Beauty, or the Fairy of the Oak, has held possession of Maguire's Opera House during the week. The piece was excellently put upon the stage, mountain lakes, enchanted forests—where devils in red, fire-breathing dragons, and recalcitrant statues encounter the traveller at every step—vieing with each other in gorgeousness and effect. The story reminds one of Tennyson's "Enchanted Palace," and one of the tableaux is evidently borrowed from that poem. Life seems to have been suddenly arrested, the dancing girl stands with tambourine outstretched, guests sit with goblets half raised to their lips, the maiden at her tambour frame neglects to draw her needle through the tapestry—all is still. In a moment the spell is broken and busy life begins. As a natural consequence the page kisses the waiting-woman—the very thing he was about to do when the spell of enchantment fell—and the guests at once empty their glasses. The closing tableau of the play is very effective indeed. And the leading characters have been well sustained without exception, Thorne as "Adelbert" glittering in silver harness, while Courtaine crosses the "Rubicon" of fun in the character of that name. Mrs. Edwin's double personation of "The Fairy of the Oak" and "Dame Ursula" was capital—the transformation from the beautiful elve to the old wrinkled, stooping lady being so perfect as to cause the audience to doubt that it is indeed the same person. Mrs. Saunders as "Mme. Babillard"—a contraction, perhaps, of babble hard—was also excellent—but when was this actress otherwise? Miss Belle Land made a pretty and charmingly dressed "Lisette," and Barry a funny "Cupidon." But to enumerate all the characters would require too much space. Miss Emma Miles bids fair to become an excellent danseuse. Last evening The Ticket-of-Leave-Man was produced for the benefit of the Ellsworth Zouave Cadets, and this afternoon The Enchanted Beauty will be given for the last time. This evening Alexander M. Kenaday—an old printer and an eminent advocate of the Eight Hour System, takes a benefit, Robert Fulford, of the San Francisco Amateur Association, appearing for the occasion as "Claude Melnotte" in The Lady of Lyons. On Monday evening Monte Christo will be produced for the benefit of James Dowling, one of our oldest stage managers.

At the Metropolitan, The Sheep's Foot still draws like a double traction engine. Strange how accidental a thing success is! Here is a piece which everybody was afraid of having anything to do with, and, behold, it turns out a perfect mine of wealth. The crowds that rush to it continue unabated, the box-sheet being generally filled two days in advance. For two or three evenings past, the private boxes have been occupied by wealthy Chinamen, who expanded their almond eyes into round hazel nuts with wonder at the miracles which these barbarian Buislays work. This evening Senor E. Buislay—the senior of the troupe—takes a benefit, and on Monday evening Julio takes the same thing. What on earth will this family do with all their money?

Tuesday evening is set aside for the benefit of Leon R. Benenx, the stage manager, who has proven as conclusively by his leap to his present position, that "some things can be done as well as others," as did Sam Patch in his leap at Niagara Falls. Mr. Beneux' benefit is a complimentary one, tendered by the whole company, the Buislays doing their Chair Perch and Niagara Leap on the occasion for the last time. Mr. Beneux deserves a good benefit for his painstaking management of this popular piece, and should receive one.

And then, on Wednesday evening, Don Sallie Hinckley Guzman appears as a beneficiary, preparatory to packing her trunks and branching off into another and a larger field of usefulness. If to risk one's neck for the entertainment of audiences, by being jerked through traps, shot into the air like a rocket, and playing the part of Meshech, Shadrach, and Abednego in a blazing furnace, deserve any recognition at all, Miss Hinckley's benefit will be a most substantial one. Few ladies on our stage have exhibited the improvement which this lady has, and California can fairly claim her as a home production, for, on her first appearance among us, she gave little promise of the excellence she has now attained. That her benefit will be a rousing one may be accepted as a foregone conclusion.

Last, but not least, comes Fred. Woodhull—another of our bright and shining California calcium lights. As an eccentric comedian, Mr. Woodhull is so clever as to warrant most favorable auguries for his future. In burlesque he has few equals and no superior upon this coast. A better "Don Nigodinas" than his assumption of that character in the present piece could not be asked for. He takes a farewell benefit on Thursday evening at the Metropolitan, and, if he have what he deserves, the house will be a full one.

At Platt's Hall, on Monday evening, the 16th instant, Miss Emily Thorne takes a complimentary benefit tendered her by the British Benevolent Association, but of this there is yet time to speak before the event comes off.

Lectures.—Monday evening next, Rev. Dr. Scudder will lecture at Platt's Hall, the proceeds going to the Building Fund of the Howard Presbyterian Church. The subject is, "The Physical Beauties and the Literature of India," interspersed with some account of its snake charmers, jugglers, and athletes. Dr. Scudder is one of the most eloquent of our divines, and the material of his lecture is gathered from personal observation, he having been for many years a resident missionary in India. His lecture is spoken of in critical notices at the East as being amusing as well as instructive in its character. On Tuesday evening John Quincy Adams will deliver a lecture upon "Life"—certainly a live subject—at the First Presbyterian church. The proceeds will go to assist the lecturer in the completion of his collegiate course of studies—certainly a worthy object.

Two Venetians, Messrs. Feiullet de Conches and Armand Baschet, are believed to be the authors of Blonde Women. They draw the following delightful picture of Parisian morals: "The Parisian courtezans, at present organized in the French capital, are like the caste of ancient Venice, now disappeared; a pernicious caste, which devours in heart, body, and estate the Adonises of every age who please this species of women; who democratize good families by degrading their sons, dissolve circles of private society, and contribute to the demoralization and destruction of the great framework of society itself. The progress of luxury and the dissolution of morals have disgusted so many men with marriage that a sort of promiscuous intercourse of limited responsibility is in favor, and becomes daily more general. 'Tis the soul which gives senses to love; but love is absent from all that commerce. Young men, with faces as worn out as an old newspaper, expire in the indolence of a useless life. Old men, who think they rejuvenate themselves, look like Father Time leading the Hours to dance."

M. Gray—who has long been a music dealer though he did not grow gray in the business—very seldom inflicts bad pieces upon the public. We have received from him "Down by the Gate," a sweet little air sung by Adelaide Phillips; Tennyson's "Song of the Brook"—music by Dolores—"Only a Withered Rose;" the original edition of "The Nightingale's Trill," as sung by Parepa; and a "Simplette" by Favarger. There is not a bad piece of music in the collection.

The New York Saturday Press comes to us in an enlarged form, and with a heading almost as handsome and quaint as The Californian. "Figaro" still figures with his racy feuilleton in its columns, but at the head of another column, as editor and proprietor, he spells his name "Henry C. Clapp Jr." Always fresh and smiling, epigrammatic and sparkling, the Saturday Press carries with it a prestige which cannot fail to impress the public with its presence.

The London Queen says: "A prettier specimen of American typography and binding than Outcroppings: being Selections of California Verse; a little volume of poetry, which comes to us through Messrs. Truhner & Co, from San Francisco, we have seldom seen. It is quite equal to the productions of the Riverside Press, and is worth securing as a good sample of what the press of San Francisco can achieve."

The Pacific Ocean House, at Santa Cruz, is announced as "opened" for the reception of guests. It will be long before it is closed under the management of its present proprietor, George T. Bromley. A report is current in some quarters that he is better at opening hotels than oysters.

[For the Californian.]

LOOSE LEAVES FROM A YOUNG LADY'S JOURNAL.

[To the Editor of The Californian—Dear Sir: As I was walking through a garden the other day, I found scattered-about pages which seemed extracts from a young lady's diary. I take the liberty to send them to you, entitled "Loose Leaves from a Young Lady's Journal." Respectfully, Dennar Steuart.]

"A man who keeps a diary pays
Due toll to many tedious days;
But life become eventful, then
His busy hand forgets the pen.
Most books, indeed, are records less
Of fulness than of emptiness."

NUMBER ONE—Introductory.

May 1st, 1862.

"Miss Nettie, do hurry down," cried little Clara, opening my door just wide enough to thrust in her curly head; "here's two of the prettiest birds, a red one and a blue one, and Charlie has seen both of their nests. They're close to the house." "And there's a splendid steamboat just coming round the head," called Charlie from the foot of the stairs. "Now you can see the Mississippi, islands, cliffs and all. And here's a wagon load of folks going out to Carr's Lake, duck-shooting."

Childhood would rise immediately upon waking. To its inexperience each new day is a fresh lease of felicity, another glimpse of Fairy-land. 'Tis a casket in which jewelled hours and resplendent moments are imbedded. Touch but the spring, and rare treasures, singing birds, and airy wreaths of flowers fly out and blossom into fragrance and delight. But we, who have gained the sad wisdom of maturity, shrink from the new comer, and dread its possibilities. Half awake, nay, more than that, we linger with thoughtful head upon our pillow. This day must be one in which the great Battle of Life is waged, and we know the night will find us partly victor or partly vanquished. We are not eager for the encounter, we hesitate ere putting on our armor. Pleasures may be in store for us, perhaps such are already promised, but we prefer imagining them upon our couch rather than reaching forth for them with the grasping fingers of the Actual.

Promises are not performances. So we look at the closed hand of the advancing Aurora with no impatient curiosity; too often have her white fingers dropped for our portion the serpent's tooth, or dead man's bone, when their dimpled bewitching clasp had assured us of silvery pearl, or fragrant marina. In this delicious doze we gaze with half-closed eyes on the beautiful sorceress, and believe that her gifts will be gracious, or, at least, we contemplate with fortitude the baffled hopes and unsatisfied desires which may cluster through the coming hours.

But, dropping the ostentatious "we," which suggests a "somebody," I resume great "I," my rightful property as one of the million nobodies. I follow Saxe's, rather than Poor Richard's advice, upon Early Rising, and I am not sure I am sorry; yet my success in life need not trouble the ghost of the latter. I am no argument against the astuteness or veracity of his proverbial assertion. I have been called many times this morning. First, the scattered chanticleers opened a sort of picket firing, to give notice of the advancing foe to sleep. Then the birds, in full concert assembled, improvised a shower of airs and sonatas in honor of the coming conqueror, until I fancied a little Patti in every tree-top, and was ready to denounce the young farmer, who remarked last evening with a pastoral air, that "the most romantic time for walking was just afore sun-up, when the birds was beginning to cackle." Cackle! indeed. Well, my ears are fairly stormed and carried, but dullness still holds the citadels of sight. And now, through closed lids, I can see the Lancers coming. Long, level rays of gleaming light are thrown with unerring precision upon my doomed eyes until I gladly capitulate, and the enemy sets up his headquarters in my room. Gay-winged messengers flit hither and thither, peeping in every corner, and sitting upon every chair.

Now, too, I hear Aunt Winnie below, moving about her work, semi-chanting in that rich tropical tone of hers, "Thine eyes shall behold the King in his beauty, and the land that is very far off." How her full voice lingers upon and repeats the words "that is very far off," and caresses with its cadences the expression, "the king in his beauty!" What a thrilling, mystical influence that monotonous singing has upon me! The very vagueness of the description heightening its effect, and whispering to my cold imagination of "the weight of glory;" suggesting dim, dreamy fancies of "the joy unspeakable." But, to Aunt Winnie, it doubtless unfolds a bright vision of "Immanuel's land," in all its entrancing splendor and luxurious repose. The African mind, with its warmth and vividness of coloring, appreciates better than the reasoning Anglo-Saxon the gorgeous, glowing Orientalisms of the Old Testament.

But I would not be driven from my bed, and, half sitting, half reclining upon my pillows, have scribbled away, dear old Journal, all this as introductory to a record of the coming summer at our Cedar Hill cottage.

ON LINDEN, ETC.

And speaking of steamboats reminds me of an incident of my late trip to Sacramento. I want to publish it as showing how going north on the river gradually enfeebles one's mind, and accounts for the strange imbecility of legislators who leave here sensible men, and become the reverse, to the astonishment of their constituents, by the time they reach their seats in the Capitol at Sacramento. John Paul, Lieutenant Ellis, and myself went up with Captain Poole to his room on the Antelope at ten o'clock last Saturday night, and by way of amusement, John Paul instituted an intellectual game. He recited the first line of "Hohenlinden:"

"On Linden, when the sun was low,"

I recited the second:

"All bloodless lay th' untrodden snow,"

Lieutenant Ellis the third:

"And dark as winter was the flow"

John Paul the fourth:

"Of Iser, rolling rapidly."

Lieutenant Ellis began the next verse, and we went through it regularly, as before.

Bill Stevenson was umpire. He held the watch, allowed a man ten seconds to recollect his line, and if he couldn't, called "Time!" and "passed the deal" to the next, and the delinquent had to send for the whisky. Or if a man misquoted a word, Bill checked the mistake on his memorandum, and it was good for four drinks. Well, we went clear through the whole poem, and only one mistake, of a single little word, was made. The drinks were ordered. We went through it again; result, one mistake, and the drinks. We went through it again; result, one mistake, and whisky. We repeated the operation; result, three misquotations, and three whiskies all round. We stayed with that poem all the way to Sacramento, arriving there at 3 in the morning, and here is the way the first verse of "Hohenlinden" stood the last time we recited it:

Myself—"On London when the tray was low—"

John Paul—"The curfew tolled the knell of parting day;"

Lieut. Ellis—"This world is but a fleeting show—"

Myself—("Hic!) Berrer dog 'n ole dog Tray!"

Bill Stevenson said: "Texas, bring four quarts of whisky and charge to these gentlemen—such stupidity as this must be severely punished."

Now just see the effect that travelling in a northerly direction has on a man. The further you go the more idiotic you become. I don't wonder that those legislators give such frequent evidences of decaying intellect. Most of them go north, you know. Mark Twain.

The Cause of and Cure for Sea Sickness.—Those who have ever crossed the Atlantic, and have experienced that horrible and indescribable feeling called sea-sickness, can readily appreciate anything that will cure, or in any way even alleviate it. Dr. John Chapman, of London, who has attained much celebrity for the Functional Diseases of the Stomach, and is well known as being a very original and deep thinker, has devoted much time to the cause of sea-sickness, as also to the remedies for it, and has found the cause of it to be an undue amount of blood in the nervous centres along the back, and especially in those segments of the spinal cord related to the stomach, and the muscles concerned in vomiting. This condition is induced by the movement of it in three ways: 1st, through the brain; 2d, through the ligaments of the spinal cord; 3d, through the abdominal and pelvic viscera. Under these circumstances, he believes the only scientific, and really effective remedy, must be one which will have the effect of lessening the amount of blood in the whole nervous centres of the back. This is done by lowering the temperature of the spinal region by the application of ice, which, though it may appear formidable, yet, when applied, is anything but so, being on the contrary decidedly agreeable. He has tried this treatment in seventeen cases, in each of which it was found entirely successful. The mode of application is, to keep along the centre of the back a bag of ice, from the top of the neck to the hollow of the back, which must be continued as long as sea sickness continues. The bag should be made of very thin gutta percha, or oil silk, so as to fit close to the back.—N. Y. Lancet.

Two actresses were quarreling in Paris—as even actresses will do at times—in the presence of a third; they got very violent, and finally approached the question of age. This was too much for the youngest; and she came out with language more forcible than flattering, more "pagan than parliamentary." Suddenly she paused in her bravura of bad words, and turning to the witness said, "Oh, ciel! ciel! what have I done? Abused her, called her such names! I never knew who was my mother, and she might be." Picture the feelings and expression of the injured one.

In consequence of the alarm about the pork disease, the pig dealers of Vienna have telegraphed to their agents in Servia and Hungary not to send them any more animals for the present, as most of the great hotels have suppressed all preparations of pork in their bills of fare.

TO KEEP A TRUE LENT.

Is this a fast, to keep
The larder leane,
And cleane
From fat of veales and sheep?

Is it to quit the dish
Of flesh, yet still
To fill
The platter high with fish?

Is it to fast an houre,
Or rag'd to go,
Or show
A down-cast look and sowre?

No, 'tis a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheat,
And meat,
Unto the hungry soul.

It is to fast from strife,
From old debate,
And hate;
To circumcise thy life.

To show a heart-grief rent,
To starve thy sin,
Not bin:
And that's to keep thy Lent. [Herrick.

[For the Californian.]

GARDENING AND HEALTH.

THE following account of the advantages of gardening as a means of procuring health is given in the hope that it may be of use to some one in a like situation:

Mr. W. had for many years been laboring under disease, without exactly knowing the nature of his complaint or being able to find any remedy for it. As he suffered greatly from indigestion and depression of spirits, he applied to several celebrated members of the medical profession, took their medicines and followed their directions without deriving any benefit from either. Still his nights continued sleepless and attended with so much pain that he was glad of any excuse to keep him out of bed; his nervous system was so deranged that, to use his own expression, "it would have been a relief if any one had shot him through the head." Weary of life, and compelled to relinquish his profession, he had almost given up all hope, when a person met him who had been similarly afflicted, and asked him if he had ever tried gardening. He advised him to leave the city at once and remove to the suburbs where he could have a garden; he did so, and began work by putting it in order and ready for planting. In the course of a few weeks he found that he was beginning to get better; he left off his doctors and medicine, and his family once more conceived hopes of a long and peaceful life being yet before him.

At the end of a year Mr. W. had as fine a garden as could be seen, with fruit trees, vines, vegetables and flowers; and he now enjoys better health than he ever did before in his life, eating his meals like a farmer, occupying the hours not devoted to his garden in literary pursuits, retiring and rising early, and enjoying all the pleasures of life, and never fails on all occasions to acknowledge that to gardening alone, under Providence, he is indebted for this happy change in his existence.

A celebrated clergyman, speaking on this subject, says: "I have discovered a new system of gymnastics—rather newer, I think, than that of Dio Lewis. It is a curious question, quite too abstruse, which is best, heavy dumb-bells, bladders, hooks, and infinite tumblings and contortions at infinite risks of your neck, or wooden-bells and a small pole, a la Lewis. Never mind! Don't puzzle your mind or break your neck to settle this question. My newer system only dates back to

——when
Adam delved and Eve span
Making it doubtful who was the gentleman.

"I discard damb-bells and sticks altogether, and go in for cow-bells and sticks with spades or hoes on the end of them. Why not?

"If you must go through all those gyrations, why not do it out of doors, and in such a way as to stir the dirt? I like Mr. Lewis' music to time the movements, but why not sing Hood's measure in the garden?

A spade, a rake, a hoe,
A pickaxe or a bell,
A hook to reap, a scythe to mow,
A flail or what you will;
And here's a ready hand
To ply the needful tool,
And skilled enough by lessons rough
In labor's rugged school.

But to the point. Ten years ago, I graduated from college a poor student, with a sickly, dead light of scholarship playing around my brain, and a body that had neither thought nor endurance. It was according to system. It was after the pattern of modern education. I had read, and studied, and crammed, and gradually woven my shroud around me to die in. But gradually I began to cultivate flowers; my time was more and more spent in the garden, laying out and planting and cultivating such of God's thoughts as he entrusted to me. The result, briefly told, is a healthy body, a mind under control, seldom clouded by dyspepsia, and capable of performing an incalculable amount of labor when required. What I wish to say to ministers particularly, and to all who are confined by indoor pursuits is, Take to your gardens, spend what time you can in them, teach your children to love them and take an interest in them; give up your highly seasoned food, live on plain diet; retire and rise early, and the pleasure and health you will thus acquire in your gardens will enable you to accomplish far more than you do now, and with far less effort. I have been acquainted for years with one of the largest operators in Wall street, whose whole leisure is spent among his plants, and he says his uniform good health and freedom from the excitement of business has been owing to his devoting his spare time in this way."

Why is it that the clergy and the press do not oftener allude to this subject, and enforce it upon their hearers and readers? In England and on the continent there is scarcely a person to be found who does not lay claim to some kind of a place for the purpose of growing flowers. Even those in the lowest walks of life have their window garden, if not more. Shall it be said in this country, with all the advantages of climate that we have, that we do not love and appreciate flowers? Will not every mother think of this, and begin to teach her children the advantages of such pursuits, and cultivate their love of the beautiful in Nature?

ON THE INFLUENCE OF SOCIAL POSITION ON LIFE.—It is said proverbially that poverty favors longevity, because the poor are not subjected to the bad consequences of luxury and wealth. Dr. Majer shows the folly of the poular dictum. It has been proved by the researches of Benoiston, De Chateauneuf, De Villerme, Casper, and others, that the value of life is less among the impoverished than the rich. Thus, of an equal number of infants of the same age double the number will die of the poorer than of the wealthier class. Where there is the greatest misery, there is the greatest mortality. According to Casper, the mean duration of life among the better class of Berlin if fifty years, but among the paupers thirty-two years only. The same writer compares the death rate of the princely and noble houses given in the Almanch de Gotha with the indigent of Berlin, and he shows that of 1000 infants among the former, fifty-seven die in the first five years; but of the same number among the latter, 345. Whilst half of the poor have attained the thirty-second year of life, half of the noble have attained the fifty-second. During epidemics the poorer classes are in a special manner decimated. That simple well-being prolongs life is demonstrated by the low mortality among persons who "assure" their lives in the assurance offices. A fifth or sixth part of negro slaves die annually. But the mortality among the free negroes who serve in the English colored regiments is only 3 per cent. The learned professions, followed generally by persons of easy means, have an incontestable influence upon the duration of life. Thus, the mean age of fifty-two French literary men was sixty-nine years. Physicians, according to Dr. Escherich, cannot hope for a long life. At all periods of age they succumb in larger numbers than other professions. But the greatest mortality is during the early periods. Three-fourth die before fifty years of age, and ten-elevenths before sixty. Old men are rare among them.—Half-Yearly Abstract of the Medical Sciences, etc.

THE FEMALE EQUESTRIAN.—A lady's horse to be perfect, should be all over handsome, and well upon its haunches. If slightly hollow in the back, so much the better, for it generally tends to ease in action, and to lessen motion in the saddle. A lady should never be heard upon the saddle—that is, there should be no bumping noise, not even in a trot. She should sit so closely, and when rising to the trot possess such elastic motion from the foot to the knee and the waist, that her return to the saddle should seem as light as a feather. She should sit "square to the front," and her horse's ears—to speak as a soldier—ought to dress well with the buttons of the bosom of her habit. Nothing is so bad as to sit with a lean to one side, and when companions are following after, to let them fear that a very little would cast her off from the stirrup side of her saddle. Her hands should be down, but light, and her arm, as well as every inclination of her figure, should harmonize with the motions of her steed, as if both possessed the same volition.

GENEROSITY does not consist in giving alone, but in making some sacrifice to enable one to give.

INFLUENCE OF THE DEMI-MONDE.

IT is undeniable that much of the present unjustifiable and unreasonable outlay springs from the growing influence of the formidable phalanx of the "demi-monde," whose chiefs, in their "war to the knife" rivalry with the world around them, incessantly strive to outshine the wives and daughters of those for whom they spread their dangerous nets. The latter, furious at the insolent splendor of the syrens who are flaunting so ostentatiously at their expense, endeavor to outshine them in their turn; and the consequences of this rivalry are seen in the enormous inflation of every branch of vainglorious expenditure which forms so prominent a feature of the day and threatens to exhaust the resources, as well as to depreciate the tone, of modern society. The danger of such a rivalry in expenditure is especially great in this country, because the French, being both envious and imitative by nature, are extremely unwilling to allow themselves to be outshone by one another; and thus the example of lavish outlay being given by those who are at the top of the social ladder is at once imitated to the extent of their possibilities by all below them. Because Princess de Metternich, one of the richest women in Europe, can afford to run up a bill of 80,000 francs for dresses in a few months at a single tradesman's, and because a great banker can give his wife 30,000 francs a month for the expenses of her toilette, all the womenkind of the region rush incontinently into an outlay for dress absurdly out of proportion to the means at their command. As for the leaders of that other world which is rapidly conquering from its enemy an unwilling recognition of its existence and its power, their principle of action seems to be to get all they can and to spend all they get. Three hundred thousand francs appears, from statistics recently gleaned by an authority in such matters, to be the average yearly "domestic" outlay of the leaders in question. They have elegant hotels, sumptuously furnished, full of pictures, statues, porcelain, and objects of virtu often of great value; an array of servants, and often keep ten or dozen horses and six or eight elegant carriages. Their horses, which are generally of great value, are usually (like their diamonds, of which they generally possess about 500,000 francs worth, though one or two have diamonds worth three times that amount, to say nothing of other jewelry,) the gift of "friends." These luxurious beauties never sleep in sheets worth less than three thousand francs a pair; never put on a gown worth less than five hundred francs, exclusive of trimmings, while the lace alone on many of their dresses costs from five to twenty thousand francs; they think nothing of putting eight or ten thousand francs' worth of the most exquisite lace on a dressing-gown, spend about sixty thousand francs a year on shoes, about as much more for bonnets, ten thousand francs for washing, and about ten francs a day for perfumery. One or two of the queens of the mercenary realm in question possess stones and trinkets that might almost rival the crown jewels of the various European monarchies, with single necklaces worth a million francs, and the other ornaments on a similar scale of value, and spend, as, for instance, the well-known ex-opera-dancer, Clotilde, a million of francs yearly on their housekeeping and toilette.

ONE of the most notable of the arrivals in the House of Lords on the opening day was the lady who came into the House, escorted by the Earl of Lovelace, and who was recognized as the Lady Anne Isabella Noel King Noel, the granddaughter of Lord Byron. As she took her seat among the Peeresses' daughters, there were few who did not regard with a peculiar interest the somewhat pale face, light brown hair, and bright, intelligent look of the daughter of "Ada."

JOHN MIDDLETON & SON will sell on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock, some forty Homestead Lots, fronting on Mission, Capp, Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets. These lots are beautifully located on the line of the Folsom street railroad. These lots have good soil, good tittle, and cannot fail to be good investments, even if the purchasers should give five times the price for them which they will actually bring under the hammer. The city is growing in that direction, and future years will ripen these green lots into "valuable city property."

DRY GOODS, at less than cost of importation, are now advertised by Meagher Traffe & Co., who have recently purchased nearly fifty thousand dollars worth at a large auction sale, at greatly reduced rates. Our lady readers will find a catalogue of the goods in their advertisement in to-day's paper.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

CONCORD WAGONS AND HARNESS.—The Pacific Concord Carriage Manufactory is prepared to supply the Pacific Coast with Concord wagons and harness made to order. The members comprising this firm have long been in the employ of the celebrated manufacturing house of L. Downing & Son, Concord, New Hampshire; so that parties wishing Concord wagons or harness can obtain just the same quality of article here and save 25 per cent. on their purchase money. We have seen some of their workmanship, and can recommend it to the public. Address Belduke & Co., 820 Folsom street, between Fourth and Fifth.—San Francisco Leader.

DAINTY WORK.—About the daintiest work we ever saw were specimens of hair jewelry at the establishment of Mrs. C. Cook, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, yesterday. This lady manufactures all sorts of jewelry—watch-chains, earrings, finger rings, breastpins, and various other kinds of ornaments—from human hair. We witnessed the process of manufacture, and it is intricate and ingenious in the highest degree.—S. F. Examiner.

WANTED—Agents to sell, by subscription only the most popular work ever written: "GRANT AND SHERMAN; their Campaigns and Generals." By the world-renowned historian, Hon. J. T. Headley, author of Washington and his Generals, Sacred Mountains, etc. Agents are taking as high as thirty subscribers per day, and all agree in pronouncing it the most saleable work they ever took hold of. The people want Headley's illustrated "GRANT AND SHERMAN," etc. For terms and territory, address E. E. SHEAR, No. 8 Montgomery Street, and Box 1,430, San Francisco, California

BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES.—If you want a trim neat, light, and yet durable style of buggy or carriage, go to Nos. 37 and 39 Webb street, between Sacramento and California, where you will find just such a vehicle as will suit your taste. POLLARD & CARVILL not only deal in these articles, but manufacture them to order, and do repairing, painting, trimming and blacksmithing with dispatch and neatness. Go and see them.—California Leader.

WAGONS.—Every species of wagons that any one can need, made of the best material, well fitted and finished, can be found at the Depot of MILLS & EVANS, 587 Market street, two doors from Second. Light, Express, Milk and Thoroughbrace wagons, also Lumber Gears, Extra Poles and Whiffletrees, with Lead Bars, are kept constantly on hand.—California Leader.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend, JOSEPH SPARROW.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY
And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quick ilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived by thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

TO FARMERS, MINERS, LABORERS

And all those wishing to secure themselves a portion of

THE MOST VALUABLE AGRICULTURAL AND MINERAL LANDS OF MEXICO,

With an equal interest in the Profits of the Plantations of

THE MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON COMPANY.

HOMES FOR THE POOR AND COMPETENCY FOR ALL.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having reserved from their final Subscription List a Limited Number of Unassessable Shares, (the remaining shares of the Company having been taken up by the stockholders,) hereby offer the same for sale at the original subscription price of Sixteen Dollars each, payable in cash. Every holder of a share will be entitled to a portion of the Company's lands, having the privilege to settle thereon and participate in all the advantages and profits of the enterprise, and special privileges granted to this Company by an Imperial Decree of Maximilian, dated 9th January, 1866, without being subjected to the conditions of regular Government emigrants, this Company settling upon their own lands, secured by private purchase, and held under indisputable Spanish titles.

Shareholders becoming actual settlers will also have the privilege of any employment upon the Company's plantation. Portions of land will be allotted to settlers, to be held by them until a final division makes it their property.

For the purpose of increasing the value of the Company's land, and to create all the comforts of a home and society, it is the intention of the company to form a regular settlement and to lay out a town adjoining their present plantation into building lots, which will likewise be fairly divided between the 8,000 shares which comprise the total number of the company.

A large number of shareholders will settle upon the company's lands after the rainy season in October next. Many of them may then be employed by the company, or by others able to plant for themselves, or in developing the mineral resources of the adjoining mountains, etc., etc.

Men of all trades and professions, desiring to emigrate to Mexico, will have great advantages as shareholders of this company. They will find the lands already purchased for them at a rate equivalent to a free gift, to be held by each shareholder as his property, protected by the best Spanish titles, and the good will of all political parties now contending for the reins of government; the climate the most salubrious, and the land rich and fertile beyond description; every kind of game abounding; the rivers full of fish and with extensive beds of large oysters; altogether, a country where it is easy to procure a livelihood and the comforts of a home with less labor and less capital than in any other part of the world.

The extensive placer diggings, veins of silver, and solid quartz ledges, which are to be found in the immediate vicinity, and acknowledged to be rich and very extensive, can, by the presence of a number of settlers, be profitably developed. Many of these mines are to be found within the limits of the company's grant. The Sierra Madre or Mother Mountain of Mexico, situated only within about twenty miles from the coast, can be reached and developed with much greater facility than the more remote mines in the interior, and will therefore make the company's lands the most desirable to locate upon.

For Maps and Survey, and further information, apply at the office of the MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON CO., Betge's Book Store, Russ House, Montgomery street, between the hours of 11 and 1 o'clock.

☞ All the assessable stock having been taken up by mutual subscription of stockholders, the company will have no more shares to offer after the limited number of unassessable shares have been placed, and shall prefer to sell these to actual settlers—a single share of which will be sufficient to entitle them to a large portion of the lands.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED shareholders in the Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having investigated and satisfied ourselves of the importance of the enterprise, recommend the same to the public. We are convinced that under the management of the present officers of the company, with their efforts to induce industrious parties to locate upon the land, that the enterprise must become very profitable to all parties interested, and most beneficial to actual settlers.

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract.

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but, we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good spits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION,

REMARKABLE CURE.

San Francisco, September 5th, 1865.

I desire to make known the fact that I was afflicted with a very bad cough for fifteen years, and, during this time, used everything which I could hear of without getting the better of my disease, until I tried Dr. D. B. Vincent's Cold Preventative or Cough Mixture, which cured me sound and well.

This is to certify that my wife has been troubled with indigestion for nearly eighteen months, and, by using one bottle of Dr. Vincent's medicine, has been completely cured.

JOHNSON J. THOMAS.

San Francisco, July 17th, 1865.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats, and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much better; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

Hush.—By Adelaide Proctor.

[For the Californian.]

THE SWEETEST SOUND.

JUST now a little quivering trill of sound,
A tiny, wandering sprite of melody—
By some musician's charmed touch set free
From the golden chords wherewith it erst was bound—
Stole through my chamber: just a pulse of song,
A bird-like breath, no more!—yet luring me
Through all the silvery hosts of Harmony,
In quest of that was sweetest. Whether strong
Sonorous battle-music, or the trill
Of fine, faint preludes, rippling from white keys;
Or the clear tenor of a voice when blent
With the full tones of some rich instrument,
Or those winged darlings of the forest trees,
Whose mellow warblings all the woodlands fill;
Whether the winds, that sweep the field of bloom,
Swaying its irised billows like a sea
Beneath th' o'er-leaning casement of my room,
Or river-waters flowing peacefully
Between their fair——
Just then, dear love, you came,
And bending, whispered that which like a flame
Sent the glad blood aleap from heart to cheek!
And in the blessed words I hear you speak
I find mine answer, dearest. Music wove
Not ever in her raptest mood, than this
A sweeter melody! Sweet though, I wis,
Bird voice and breeze—each tuneful sound that is—
Sweetest of all, praise from the lips we love!

INIGOINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 14th, 1866.

PERHAPS there be some matter-of-fact persons who imagine that because my feuilleton—I believe that is what they call these things—is dated Saturday, it is therefore written on the last day of the week.

On the contrary, quite the reverse. I am taking Time by the forelock this time—the old thief has taken me by the top lock and snatched me nearly bald-headed—and am writing on Wednesday afternoon. Generally it is my favorite custom to never do to-day what can be put off until to-morrow, leaving these brilliant pages to be written at the very last moment.

But this week I'm making up lost time. Monday I was persuaded to attend an exhibition given by a friend of mine, recently returned from the East, and emulous of the Buislays.

The feat performed is commonly known as l'echelle perileuse—though I do not see why they don't change the nomenclature to l'ehalf-chelle perileuse, so as to carry a greater idea of danger, for a half-shell is probably the most perilous thing on earth.

The performance was given for the benefit of one of the orphan asylums and proved an immense success, so that I quite envy my friend the blessings that will be showered upon his path through life by little fellows who have neither fathers nor mothers.

Who is my friend? Ah! that is a nut for you to crack. Try your teeth on it and you may perhaps find a kernel in the shell. It is something to know that gas-fixtures can be turned into trapeze bars and a performance upon them go off with a blaze of success.

As I was saying, however, this letter is post-dated. I wish the banks would let me give notes in the same way, but they won't.

It is great fun for me to disconnt time in this way, moving myself by a single stroke of the pen from the middle to the end of the week.

Anything to get away from the Past and beyond the Present. I sometimes think that if I could move my goods and chattels into the Future and have a permanent abiding place there, I should be perfectly happy.

For my fortune, my wife, the children that climb around one's knees and all that, my cottage with vines climbing over the trellises and a cat sitting on top of the roof—everything in fact that is popularly supposed to make life pleasant, so far as I am concerned lies in the Future, always has lain there, and I suppose always will lie there.

It is curious, though, that I've never overtaken any of these blessings—the Lord knows I travel pretty fast once and a while. Occasionally, when jockeyed a little, I've contrived to crowd the better part of a year down into a day—but no use. The more I get near all the things that are said to be in store for the severely virtuous and deserving, the more I don't get them and the further off they look.

Ah, well! I'll contrive to nip them some day.

Seriously, I never saw much in the Past or the Present to please. Thinking of the good times one has had is very much like a hungry man's rocking himself to sleep over a recollection of the magnificent dinners he has eaten. As for the Present—it never performs much notwithstanding all its promises. It is a landlord, standing at its door, and directing the footsore and weary traveller on to the next inn.

Perhaps the fault all lies in not having "a contented spirit." And beyond doubt if such be the case one should endeavor to procure one at once. But perhaps you remember that he who looked the world through to possess himself of the Happy Man's shirt, discovered to his chagrin, on finding the Happy Man, that he had no shirt. And very much so, I fancy, would it be with the Contented Man—find him and you will find that he has no spirit.

A man once advertised a fine house and lot to be given to the really contented person. Thousands called on him. To each one he put the question:

Are you really contented?

All said "Yes."

"Then," said the wag—he was a rare wag—"what do you want of my house and lot?"

It is not in human nature, nor in woman nature, to be satisfied. Have you never seen an infant deriving nourishment, etc., from what Mr. Micawber delicately terms "the maternal fount?" If so, beyond doubt, you have seen the little philosopher suddenly throw back its head, turn away from its mother, look inquiringly round the room at all the other women, and then shut its eyes and cry.

Perhaps you've been puzzled to know what the matter was. Bah! plain as a pike-staff. The little fellow was wondering if there wasn't a better quality of milk around than he was getting, and was mad because he couldn't solve the problem.

Why do people travel? Why do they move from one house into another, and why are they constantly building better steamboats and railroad cars, and planning all manner of improvements in everything, from a hoop skirt to a hay press?

It is simply because they are not satisfied. We'd be paddling about the North River now in affairs that looked like a cross between a churn and a bread-trough, had Fulton been satisfied with the first steamboat he built.

To take a bright and shining example, had I been satisfied with the first few thousand dollars I ever made, what would have been my position in life? Respectable obscurity, not to say virtuous indigence. And look at me now. What is my present position?

It is a pity that all conundrums are not as easy to answer: Owing more than it is probable I shall ever be able to pay, unless the Bank of California discounts my notes with more alacrity than it has ever yet shown, and for larger amounts than it has yet exhibited a willingness to.

I don't know but that the credit of the concern stands quite as well as it would if it discounted the notes of every one that applied, though, perhaps, it has scarcely as many friends.

I have always thought that a small piece of "30-day paper," not "done" for my friend the Flag, accounts for the milk in the cocoanut of the editor, when he sat down to the composition of his most famous diatribe against monopolies.

For my part, I'm rather in favor of monopolies. THE CALIFORNIAN is a tremendous one, for, aside from monopolizing all the available talent on the coast, it monopolizes all the time of its proprietors, to say nothing of their money.

That is why it's the good thing it is.

The fact of the matter is that what cannot be monopolized isn't worth having. Sometimes, I've wished I could monopolize all the water in the world, and make people sweat it out on whiskey till they got tired of it. For I do believe that they'd very soon take kindly to a stiff water-cocktail, the edge of the glass just rubbed with ice.

And if I could monopolize all the women in the world, I'd make Brigham Young and his saints, as well as all outside sinners, mighty glad to get one wife, and content, when they got her, to treat her well and leave other people's alone.

Right here, while talking about wives, I should really like to know if matrimony is indeed like the measles. I mean, is it catching.

Another friend of mine went to that white covered altar from whose bourne no bachelor returns, the other day.

I, of course, devoted a little of my valuable time to the occasion, for who can refuse the last kind offices of friendship?

How easy the thing is done! Why, it's as easy as rolling off a log, or hanging, or saying "Yes" when asked to take a drink.

Not much expense about it either, for most everybody's got a claw-hammer coat; and white kids don't cost much. It is only a thought of the board-bills that need trouble you with any peculiar pertinence, and one can get rid of them easily enough by going to housekeeping.

On the whole, I think I'll get married.

To tell the truth, the idea has occurred to me before, and only two things ever prevented my putting it into instant execution. One was the difficulty of finding any one I'd have: the other the difficulty of finding any one who'd have me.

And, as the latter difficulty came first, it blocked the game in the outset, and never gave me a chance to experiment with the former one.

When I am married, "No cards" will be attached to the notice. I'm determined that there shall be no playing of Seven-Up or Draw-Poker at my wedding. And for my part, I intend thereafter to go back on all games of chance, and confine myself wholly to shaking Poker Dice, at which beautiful, though sometimes uncertain game, I do think I can beat the oldest man alive.

Some old poet says:

> Marriage is a rabble rout,
> Those who are oute would be in,
> And those who are in would fayne be oute;

And another—Ariosto, if I remember rightly—advises us to > Go plough the furrowed waves and sow the sand,

> Seek to entrap the vagabond winds i' nets,
> But found no faith in woman's heart nor hand.

Nonsense! So far as my experience goes, women are about as true as men—and I don't know but that they are truer. And in disposition they are not so different as some persons preach and a great many affect to believe. There is a great deal of human nature in both.

As for marriage, it is probably a very good institution in its way. St. Paul says it is better to marry than to burn—and probably it is, though I know a good many fellows who'd let it get pretty warm for them first.

Irving quaintly and beautifully remarks that he who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb will also accommodate the yoke of matrimony to the submissive neck.

It is neck or nothing in most things, now-a-days, and matrimony—matter o' money, as it is sometimes pronounced—is one of the Civil Rites.

And apropos de bottes, how about our new-made citizens—the gay and festive Chinese? Is not their name John—Le-John, as one might say?

PORTRAIT OF AN AUTHOR.

PAINTED BY HIS PUBLISHER.

THE title of the singular work which forms the base of the following article is, Portrait Intime de Balzac: sa Vie, son Humeur et son Caractére. Par Edmond Werdet, son ancien Libraire-Editeur. Before, however, we allow Monsieur Werdet to relate his own personal experience of the celebrated writer, it will be advisable to introduce the subject by giving an outline of the struggle, the privations, and the disappointments which marked the early life of Balzac, and which, doubtless, influenced his after character for the worse. These particulars are given by Monsieur Werdet in the form of an episode, and are principally derived, on his part, from information afforded by the author's sister.

Honoré de Balzac was born in the city of Tours, on the sixteenth of May, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine. His parents were people of rank and position in the world. His father held a legal appointment in the council chamber of Louis the Sixteenth. His mother was the daughter of one of the directors of the public hospitals in Paris. She was much younger than her husband, and brought him a rich dowry. Honoré was her first-born; and he retained throughout life his first feeling of childish reverence for his mother. That mother suffered the unspeakable affliction of seeing her illustrious son taken from her by death at the age of fifty years. Balzac breathed his last in the kind arms which had first caressed him on the day of his birth.

His father, from whom he evidently inherited much of the eccentricity of his character, is described as a compound of Moutaigne, Rabelais, and Uncle Toby—a man in manners, conversation, and disposition generally, of the quaintly original sort. On the breaking out of the Revolution, he lost his court situation, and obtained a place in the commissariat department of the army of the North. This appointment he held for some years. It was of the greater importance to him, in consequence of the change for the worse produced in the pecuniary circumstances of the family by the convulsions of the Revolution.

At the age of seven years Balzac was sent to the college of Vendome; and for seven years more there he remained. This period of his life was never a pleasant one in his remembrance. The reduced circumstances of his family exposed him to much sordid persecution and ridicule from the other boys; and he got on but little better with the masters. They reported him as idle and incapable—or, in other words, as ready enough to devour all sorts of books on his own desultory plan, but hopelessly obstinate in resisting the educational discipline of the school. This time of his life he has reproduced in one of the strangest and the most mystical of all his novels, La Vie Intellectuelle de Louis Lambert.

On reaching the critical age of fourteen, his intellect appears to have suffered under a species of eclipse, which occurred very suddenly and mysteriously, and the cause of which neither his masters nor the medical men were able to explain. He himself always declared in after-life, with a touch of his father's quaintness, that his brain had been attacked by "a congestion of ideas." Whatever the cause might be, the effect was so serious that the progress of his education had to be stopped; and his removal from the college followed as a matter of course. Time, care, quiet, and breathing his native air, gradually restored him to himself; and he was ultimately enabled to complete his studies at two private schools. Here again, however, he did nothing to distinguish himself among his fellow-pupils. He read incessantly, and preserved the fruits of his reading with marvellous power of memory; but the school-teaching, which did well enough for ordinary boys, was exactly the species of teaching from which the essentially original mind of Balzac recoiled in disgust. All that he felt and did at this period has been carefully reproduced by his own pen in the earlier pages of Le Lys dans le Vallée.

Badly as he got on at school, he managed to imbibe a sufficient quantity of conventional learning to entitle him, at the age of eighteen, to his degree of Bachelor of Arts. He was destined for the law; and after attending the legal lectures in the various Institutions of Paris, he passed his examination by the time he was twenty, and then entered a notary's office in the capacity of clerk. There were two other clerks to keep him company, who hated the drudgery of the law as heartily as he hated it himself. One of them was the future author of the Mysteries of Paris, Eugéne Sue; the other was the famous critic, Jules Janin.

After he had been engaged in this office, and in another, for more than three years, a legal friend, who was under great obligations to Balzac the father, offered to give up his business as a notary to Balzac the son. To the great scandal of the family, Honoré resolutely refused the offer—for the one sufficient reason that he had determined to be the greatest writer in France. His relations began by laughing at him, and ended by growing angry with him. But nothing moved Honoré. His vanity was of the calm, settled sort; and his own conviction that his business in life was simply to be a famous man proved too strong to be shaken by anybody.

While he and his family were at war on this point, a change for the worse occurred in the elder Balzac's official circumstances. He was superannuated. The diminution of income thus produced was followed by a pecuniary catastrophe. He had embarked almost the whole of his own little remaining property and his wife's in two speculations; and they both failed. No resource was now left him but to retire to a small country house in the neighborhood of Paris, which he had purchased in his prosperous days, and to live there as well as might be on the wreck of his lost fortune. Honoré, sticking fast to the hopeless business of becoming a great man, was, by his own desire, left alone in a Paris garret, with an allowance of five pounds English a month, which was all the kind father could spare to feed, clothe, and lodge the wrong-headed son.

And now, without a literary friend to help him in all Paris, alone in his wretched attic, his dog's-eared books, his bescrawled papers, his wild vanity, and his ravenous hunger for fame, Balzac stripped resolutely for the fight. He was then twenty-three years old—a sturdy fellow to look at, with a big, jovial face, and a strong square forehead, topped by a very untidy and superfluous allowance of long tangled hair. His only difficulty at starting was what to begin upon. After consuming many lonely months in sketching out comedies, operas, and novels, he finally obeyed the one disastrous rule which seems to admit of no exception in the early lives of men of letters, and fixed the whole bent of his industry and his genius on the production of a tragedy. After infinite pains and long labor, the great work was completed. The subject was Cromwell; and the treatment in Balzac's hands appears to have been so inconceivably bad, that even his own family—to say nothing of other judicious friends—told him in the plainest terms, when he read it to them, that he had perpetrated a signal failure. Modest men might have been discouraged by this. Balzac took his manuscript back to his garret, standing higher in his own estimation than ever. "I will give up being a great dramatist," he told his parents at parting, "and will be a great novelist instead." The vanity of the man expressed itself with this sublime disregard of ridicule all through his life. It was a precious quality to him—and it is surely (however unquestionably offensive it may be to our friends) a precious quality to all of us. What man ever yet did anything great, without beginning with a profound belief in his own untried powers?

Confident as ever, therefore, in his own resources, Balzac now took up the pen once more—this time, in the character of a novelist. But another and a serious check awaited him at the outset. Fifteen months of solitude, privation, and reckless hard writing—months which are recorded in the pages of La Peau de Chagrin with a fearful and pathetic truth drawn straight from the bitterest of all experiences, the experience of studious poverty—had reduced him to a condition of bodily weakness which made all present exertion of his mental powers simply hopeless, and which obliged him to take refuge—a worn-out, wasted man, at the age of twenty three—in his father's quiet little country house. Here, under his mother's care, his exhausted energies slowly revived; and here, in the first days of his convalescence, he returned, with the grim resolution of despair, to working out the old dream in the garret, to resuming the old hopeless business of making himself a great man.

It was under his father's roof, during the time of his slow recovery, that the youthful fictions of Balzac were produced. The strength of his belief in his own resources and his own future gave him also the strength, in relation to these first efforts, to rise above his own vanity, and to see plainly that he had not yet learnt to do himself full justice. His early novels bore on their title-pages a variety of feigned names, for the starving, struggling author was too proud to acknowledge them, so long as they failed to satisfy his own conception of what his own powers could accomplish. These first efforts—now included in the Belgian editions of his collected works, and comprising among them two stories, Jane la Pale and Le Vicaire des Ardennes, which show unquestionable dawnings of the genius of a great writer—were originally published by the lower and more rapacious order of booksellers, and did as little toward increasing his means as toward establishing his reputation. Still, he forced his way slowly and resolutely through poverty, obscurity, and disappointment, nearer and nearer to the promised land which no eye saw but his own—a greater man, by far, at this hard period of his adversity than at the more trying after-time of his prosperity and his fame. One by one, the heavy years rolled on till he was a man of thirty; and then the great prize which he had so long toiled for, dropped within his reach at last. In the year eighteen hundred and twenty nine, the famous Physiologie du Mariage was published; and the starveling of the Paris garret became a name and a power in French literature.

In England, this book would have been universally condemned as an unpardonable exposure of the most sacred secrets of domestic life. It unveils the whole social side of Marriage in its innermost recesses, and exhibits it alternately in its bright and dark aspects, with a marvellous minuteness of observation, a profound knowledge of human nature, and a daring eccentricity of style and arrangement which amply justify the extraordinary success of the book on its first appearance in France. It may be more than questionable, judging from the English point of view, whether such a subject should ever have been selected for any other than the most serious, reverent, and forbearing treatment. Setting this objection aside, however, in consideration of the French point of view, it cannot be denied that the merits of the Physiology of Marriage, as a piece of writing, were by no means overestimated by the public to which it was addressed. In a literary sense, the book would have done credit to a man in the maturity of his powers. As the work of a man whose intellectual life was only beginning, it was such an achievement as is not often recorded in the history of modern literature.

This first triumph of the future novelist—obtained, curiously enough, by a book which was not a novel—failed to smooth the way onward and upward for Balzac as speedily and pleasantly as might have been supposed. He had another stumble on that hard road of his, before he fairly started on the career of success. Soon after the publication of the Physiology of Marriage, an unlucky idea of strengthening his resources by trading in literature, as well as by writing books, seems to have occurred to him. He tried bookselling and printing; proved himself to be, in both cases, probably the very worst man of business who ever lived and breathed in this world; failed in the most hopeless way, and with the most extraordinary rapidity; and so learnt at last, by the cruel teaching of experience, that his one fair chance of getting money lay in sticking fast to his pen for the rest of his days. In the next ten years of his life, that pen produced the noble series of fictions which influenced French literature far and wide, and which will last in public remembrance long after the miserable errors and inconsistencies of the writer's personal character are forgotten. This was the period when Balzac was in the full enjoyment of his matured intellectual powers and his enviable public celebrity; and this was also the golden time when his publisher and biographer first became acquainted with him. Now, therefore, Monsieur Werdet may be encouraged to come forward and take the post of honor as narrator of the strange story that is to be told; for now he is placed in the fit position to address himself intelligibly, as well as amusingly, to an English audience.

The story opens with the starting of Monsieur Werdet as a publisher in Paris, on his own account. The modest capital at his command amounted to just one hundred and twenty pounds English; and his leading idea, on beginning business, was to become the publisher of Balzac.

He had already entered into transactions, on a large scale, with his favorite author, in the character of agent for a publishing house of high standing. He had been very well received, on that first occasion, as a man representing undeniable capital and a great commercial position. On the second occasion, however, of his representing nobody but himself and nothing but the smallest of existing capitals, he very wisely secured the protection of an intimate friend of Balzac's to introduce him as favorably as might be, for the second time. Accompanied by this gentleman, whose name was Monsieur Barbier, and carrying his capital in his pocket-book, the embryo publisher nervously presented himself in the sanctum sanctorum of the great man.

Monsieur Barbier having carefully explained the business on which they came, Balzac addressed himself, with an indescribable suavity and grandeur of manner, to anxious Monsieur Werdet.

"Just so," said the eminent man. "You are doubtless possessed, sir, of considerable capital? You are probably aware that no man can hope to publish for ME who is not prepared to assert himself magnificently in the matter of cash? I sell high—high—very high. And not to deceive you—for I am incapable of suppressing the truth—I am a man who requires to be dealt with on the principle of considerable advances. Proceed, sir—I am prepared to listen to you."

But Monsieur Werdet was too cautious to proceed without strengthening his position before starting. He entrenched himself instantly behind his pocket-book.

One by one, the notes of the Bank of France, which formed the poor publisher's small capital, were drawn out of their snug hiding-place. Monsieur Werdet produced six of them, representing five hundred francs each (or, as before mentioned, a hundred and twenty pounds sterling,) arranged them neatly and impressively on the table, and then cast himself on the author's mercy in an agitated voice, and in these words:

"Sir! behold my capital. There lies my whole fortune. It is yours in exchange for any book you please to write for me."

And at that point, to the horror and astonishment of Monsieur Werdet, his further progress was cut short by roars of laughter—formidable roars, as he himself expressly states—bursting from the lungs of the highly diverted Balzac.

"What astonishing simplicity!" exclaimed the great man. "Do you actually believe, sir, that I—De Balzac—can so entirely forget what is due to myself as to sell you any conceivable species of fiction which is the product of MY PEN, for the sum of three thousand francs? You have come here Monsieur Werdet, to address an offer to me, without preparing yourself by previous reflection. If I felt so disposed, I should have every right to consider your conduct as unbecoming in the highest degree. But I don't feel so disposed. On the contrary, I can even allow your honest ignorance, your innocent confidence, to excuse you in my estimation. Don't be alarmed, sir, I excuse you to a certain extent."

Between disappointment, indignation, and astonishment, Monsieur Werdet was struck dumb. His friend, Monsieur Barbier, therefore spoke for him, urging every possible consideration; and finally proposing that Balzac, if he was determined not to write a new story for three thousand francs, should at least sell one edition of an old one for that sum. Monsieur Barbier's arguments were admirably put: they lasted a long time; and when they had come to an end, they received this reply:

"Gentlemen!" cried Balzac, pushing back his long hair from his heated temples, and taking a fresh dip of ink, "you have wasted an hour of MY TIME in talking of trifles. I rate the pecuniary loss thus occasioned to me at two hundred francs. My time is my capital. I must work. Gentlemen! leave me." Having expressed himself in these hospitable terms, the great man immediately resumed the process of composition.

Monsieur Werdet, naturally and properly indignant, immediately left the room. He was overtaken, after he had proceeded a little distance in the street, by his friend Barbier, who had remained behind to remonstrate.

"You have every reason to be offended," said Barbier. "His conduct is inexcusable. But, pray, don't suppose that your negotiation is broken off." I know him better than you do; and I tell you that you have nailed Balzac. He wants money, and before three days are over your head he will return your visit."

"If he does," replied Werdet, "I'll pitch him out of the window."

"No, you won't," said Barbier. "In the first place, it is an extremely uncivil proceeding to pitch a man out of the window; and, as a naturally polite gentleman, you are incapable of committing a breach of good manners. In the second place, rude as he has been to you, Balzac is not the less a man of genius; and, as such, he is just the man of whom you, as a publisher, stand in need. Wait patiently; and in a day or two you will see him, or hear from him again."

Barbier was right. Three days afterward, the following satisfactory communication was received by Monsieur Werdet:

"My brain, sir, was so prodigiously preoccupied by work uncongenial to my fancy, when you visited me the other day, that I was incapable of comprehending otherwise than imperfectly what it is that you wanted of me.

"To-day, my brain is not preoccupied. Do me the favor to call and see me at four o'clock.

"A thousand civilities.

"DE BALZAC."

Monsieur Werdet viewed this singular note in the light of a fresh impertinence. On consideration, however, he acknowledged it, and curtly added that important business would prevent his accepting the appointment proposed to him.

In two days more, friend Barbier came with a second invitation from the great man. But Monsieur Werdet steadily refused it. "Balzac has already been playing his game with me," he said. "Now, it is my turn to play my game with Balzac. I mean to keep him waiting four days longer."

At the end of that time, Monsieur Werdet once more entered the sanctum sanctorum. On this second occasion. Balzac's graceful politeness was indescribable. He deplored the rarity of intelligent publishers. He declared his deep sense of the importance of an intelligent publisher's appearance on the literary horizon. He expressed himself as quite enchanted to be now enabled to remark that appearance, to welcome it, and even to deal with it. Polite as he was by nature, Monsieur Werdet had no chance this time against Monsieur de Balzac. In the race of civility the publisher was now nowhere, and the author made all the running.

The interview, thus happily begun, terminated in a most agreeable transaction on both sides. Balzac cheerfully locked up the six bank notes in his strong-box. Werdet, as cheerfully, retired with a written agreement in his empty pocket book, authorizing him to publish the second edition of Le Médecin de Campagne—hardly, it may be remarked in parenthesis, one of the best to select of the novels of Balzac.

II.

ONCE started in business as the happy proprietor and hopeful publisher of the second edition of Le Médecin de Campagne, Monsieur Werdet was too wise a man not to avail himself of the only certain means of success in modern times. He puffed magnificently. Every newspaper in Paris was inundated with a deluge of advertisements, announcing the forthcoming work in terms of eulogy such as the wonder-struck reader had never met with before. The result, aided by Balzac's celebrity, was a phenomenon in the commercial history of French literature. Every copy of the second edition of Le Médicin de Campagne was sold in eight days.

This success established Monsieur Werdet's reputation. Young authors crowded to him with their manuscripts, all declaring piteously that they wrote in the style of Balzac. But Monsieur Werdet flew at higher game. He received the imitators politely, and even published for one or two of them; but the high business aspirations which glowed within him were all concentrated on the great original. He had conceived the sublime idea of becoming Balzac's sole publisher: of buying up all his copyrights held by other houses, and of issuing all his new works that were yet to be written. Balzac himself welcomed this proposal with superb indulgence. "Walter Scott," he said, in his grandest way, "had only one publisher—Archibald Constable. Work out your idea. I authorize it; I support it. I will be Scott, and you shall be Constable!"

Fired by the prodigious future thus disclosed to him, Monsieur Werdet assumed forthwith the character of a French Constable; and opened negotiations with no less than six publishers who held among them the much-desired copyrights. His own enthusiasm did something for him; his excellent previous character in the trade, and his remarkable success at starting, did much more. The houses he dealt with took his bills in all directions, without troubling him for security. After innumerable interviews and immense exercise of diplomacy, he raised himself at last to the pinnacle of his ambition—he became sole proprietor and publisher of the works of Balzac.

The next question—a sordid, but, unhappily, a necessary question also—was how to turn this precious acquisition to the best pecuniary account. Some of the works, such as La Physiologie du Mariage and La Peau de Chagrin, had produced, and were still producing, large sums. Others, on the contrary, such as the Contes Philosophiques (which were a little too profound for the public) and Louis Lambert (which was intended to popularize the mysticisms of Swedenborg,) had not yet succeeded in paying their expenses. Estimating his speculation by what he had in hand, Monsieur Werdet had not much chance of seeing his way speedily to quick returns. Estimating it, however, by what was coming in the future, that is to say, by the promised privilege of issuing all the writer's contemplated works, he had every reason to look happily and hopefully at his commercial prospects. At this crisis of the narrative, when the publisher's credit and fortune depended wholly on the credit of one man, the history of that man's habits of literary composition assumes a special interest and importance. Monsieur Werdet's description of Balzac at his writing-desk presents by no means the least extraordinary of the many singular revelations which compose the story of the author's life.

When he had once made up his mind to produce a new book, Balzac's first proceeding was to think it out thoroughly before he put pen to paper. He was not satisfied with possessing himself of the main idea only; he followed it mentally into its minutest ramifications, devoting to the process just that amount of patient, hard labor and self-sacrifice which no inferior writer ever has the common sense or the courage to bestow on his work. With his note-book ready in his hand, Balzac studied his scenes and characters straight from life. General knowledge of what he wanted to describe was not enough for this determined realist. If he found himself in the least at fault, he would not hesitate to take a long journey merely to insure truth to nature in describing the street of a country town, or in painting some minor peculiarity of rustic character. In Paris he was perpetually about the streets, perpetually penetrating into all classes of society, to study the human nature about him in its minutest varieties. Day by day, and week by week, his note-book and his brains were hard at work together, before he thought of sitting down to his desk to begin. When he had finally amassed his materials in this laborious manner, he at last retired to his study; and from that time, till his book had gone to press, society saw him no more.

His house-door was now closed to everybody, except the publisher and the printer; and his costume was changed to a loose white robe, of the sort which is worn by the Dominican monks. This singular writing-dress was fastened round the waist by a chain of Venetian gold, to which hung little pliers and scissors of the same precious metal. White Turkish trousers, and red-morocco slippers, embroidered with gold, covered his legs and feet. On the day when he sat down to his desk, the light of heaven was shut out, and he worked by the light of candles in superb silver sconces. Even letters were not allowed to reach him. They were all thrown, as they came, into a japan vase, and not opened, no matter how important they might be, till his work was all over. He rose to begin writing at two in the morning, continued, with extraordinary rapidity, till six; then took his warm bath, and stopped in it, thinking, for an hour or more. At eight o'clock his servant brought him up a cup of coffee. Before nine his publisher was admitted to carry away what he had done. From nine till noon he wrote again, always at the top of his speed. At noon he breakfasted on eggs, with a glass of water and a second cup of coffee. From one o'clock to six he returned to work. At six he dined lightly, only allowing himself one glass of wine. From seven to eight he received his publisher again; and at eight o'clock he went to bed. This life he led, while he was writing his books, for two months together, without intermission. Its effect on his health was such that, when he appeared once more among his friends, he looked, in the popular phrase, like his own ghost. Chance acquaintances would hardly have known him again.

It must not be supposed that this life of resolute seclusion and fierce hard toil ended with the completion of the first draught of his manuscript. At the point where, in the instances of most men, the serious part of the work would have come to an end, it had only begun for Balzac.

In spite of all the preliminary studying and thinking, when his pen had scrambled its way straight through to the end of the book, the leaves were all turned back again, and the first manuscript was altered into a second with inconceivable patience and care. Innumerable corrections and interlinings, to begin with, led in the end to transpositions and expansions which metamorphosed the entire work. Happy thoughts were picked out of the beginning of the manuscript, and inserted where they might have a better effect at the end. Others at the end would be moved to the beginning, or the middle. In one place, chapters would be expanded to three or four times their original length; in another, abridged to a few paragraphs; in a third, taken out altogether, or shifted to new positions. With all this mass of alterations in every page, the manuscript was at last ready for the printer. Even to the experienced eyes in the printing office, it was now all but illegible. The deciphering it, and setting it up in a moderately correct form, cost an amount of patience and pains which wearied out all the best men in the office, one after another, before the first series of proofs could be submitted to the author's eye. When these were at last complete, they were sent in on large slips, and the indefatigable Balzac immediately set to work to rewrite the whole book for the third time!

He now covered with fresh corrections, fresh alterations, fresh expansion of this passage, and fresh abridgements of that, not only the margins of the proofs all round, but even the little intervals of white space between the paragraphs. Lines crossing each other in indescribable confusion were supposed to show the bewildered printer the various places at which the multitude of new insertions were to be slipped in. Illegible as Balzac's original manuscripts were, his corrected proofs were more hopelessly puzzling still. The picked men in the office, to whom alone they could be entrusted, shuddered at the very name of Balzac, and relieved each other at intervals of an hour, beyond which time no one printer could be got to continue the work on the universally execrated and universally unintelligible proofs. The "revises"—that is to say, the proofs embodying the new alterations—were next pulled to pieces in their turn. Two, three, and sometimes four, separate sets of them were required before the author's leave could be got to send the perpetually rewritten book to press, at last, and so have done with it. He was literally the terror of all the printers and editors; and he himself described his process of work as a misfortune, to be the more deplored, because it was, in his case, an intellectual necessity. "I toil sixteen hours out of the twenty-four," he said," "over the elaboration of my unhappy style; and I am never satisfied, myself, when all is done."

Looking back to the school-days of Balzac, when his mind suffered under the sudden and mysterious shock which has already been described in its place; remembering that his father's character was notorious for its eccentricity; observing the prodigious toil, the torture almost, of mind which the act of literary production seems to have cost him all through life, it is impossible not to arrive at the conclusion, that, in his case, there must have been a fatal incompleteness somewhere in the mysterious intellectual machine. Magnificently as it was endowed, the balance of faculties in his mind seems to have been more than ordinarily imperfect. On this theory, his unparalleled difficulties in expressing himself as a writer, and his errors, incousistencies, and meannesses of character, as a man, become, at least, not wholly unintelligible. On any other theory, all explanation both of his personal life and his literary life appears to be simply impossible.

Such was the perilous pen on which Monsieur Werdet's prospects in life all depended. If Balzac failed to perform his engagements punctually, or if his health broke down under his severe literary exertions, the commercial decease of his unfortunate publisher followed either disaster, purely as a matter of course.

At the outset, however, the posture of affairs looked encouragingly enough. On its completon in the Revue de Paris, Le Lys dans la Vallée was republished by Monsieur Werdet, who had secured his interest in the work by a timely advance of six thousand francs. Of this novel (the most highly valued in France of all the writer's fictions,) but two hundred copies of the first edition were left undisposed of two hours after its publication. This unparalleled success kept Monsieur Werdet's head above water, and encouraged him to hope great things from the next novel (Séraphita.) which was also begun, periodically, in the Revue de Paris. Before it was finished, however, Balzac and the editor of the Review quarrelled. The long-suffering publisher was obliged to step in and pay the author's forfeit-money, obtaining the incomplete novel in return, and with it Balzac's promise to finish the work off hand. Months passed, however, and not a page of manuscript was produced. One morning, at eight o'clock, to Monsieur Werdet's horror and astonishment, Balzac burst in on him in a condition of sublime despair. to announce that he and his genius had to all appearance parted company forever.

"My brain is empty!" cried the great man. "My imagination is dried up! Huadreds of cups of coffee and two warm baths a day have done nothing for me. Werdet! I am a lost man!"

The publisher thought of his empty cash-box, and was petrified. The author proceeded:

"I must travel!" he exclaimed, distractedly. "My genius has run away from me—I must pursue it over mountains and valleys. Werdet! I must catch my genius up?"

Poor Monsieur Werdet faintly suggested a little tura in the immediate neighborhood of Paris—something equivalent to a nice airy ride to Hampstead on the top of an omnibus. But Balzac's runaway genius had, in the estimation of its bereaved proprietor, got as far as Vienna already; and he coolly announced his intention of travelling after it to the Austrian capital.

"And who is to finish Séraphita?" inquired the unhappy publisher. "My illustrious friend, you are ruining me!"

"On the contrary," remarked Balzac, persuasively, "I am making your fortune. At Vienna, I shall find my genius—at Vienna I shall finish Séraphita, and a new book besides—at Vienna, I shall meet with an angelic woman who admires me—she permits me to call her 'Carissima'—she has written to invite me to Vienaa—I ought, I must, I will, accept the invitation."

Here an ordinary acquaintance would have had an excellent opportunity of saying something smart. But poor Monsieur Werdet was not in a position to be witty; and, moreover, he knew but too well what was coming next. All he ventured to say was:

"But I am afraid you have no money."

"You can raise some," replied his illustrious friend. "Borrow—deposit stock in trade—get me two thousand francs. Everything else I can do for myself. Werdet, I will hire a postchaise—I will dine with my dear sister—I will set off after dinner—I will aot be later than eight o'clock—click clack!" And the great man executed an admirable imitation of the cracking of a postilion's whip.

There was no resource for Monsieur Werdet but to throw the good money after the bad. He raised the two thousand francs: and away went Balzac to catch his runaway genius, to bask in the society of a female angel, and to coin money in the form of manuscripts.

Eighteen days afterward a perfumed letter from the author reached the publisher. He had caught his genius at Vienna; he had been magnificently received by the aristocracy; he had finished Séraphita, and nearly completed the other book; his angelic friend, Carissima, already loved Werdet from Balzac's description of him; Balzac himself was Werdet's friend till death; Werdet was his Archibald Constable; Werdet should see him again in fifteen days; Werdet should ride in his carriage in the Bois de Boulogne, and meet Balzac riding in his carriage, and see the enemies of both parties looking on at the magnificent spectacle and bursting with spite. Finally, Werdet would have the goodness to remark (in a postscript) that Balzac had provided himself with another little advance of fifteen hundred francs, received from Rothschild in Vienna, and had given in exchange a bill at ten days' sight on his excellent publisher, on his admirable and devoted Archibald Constable.

While Monsieur Werdet was still prostrate under the effect of this audacious postscript, a clerk entered his office with the identical bill. It was drawn at one days' sight instead of ten; and the money was wanted immediately. The publisher was the most long-suffering of men; but there were limits even to his patient endurance. He took Balzac's letter with him, and went at once to the office of the Parisian Rothschild. The great financier received him kindly; admitted that there must have been some mistake; granted the ten days' grace; and dismissed his visitor with this excellent and sententious piece of advice:

"I recommend you to mind what you are about, sir, with Monsieur de Balzac. He is a highly inconsequent man."

It was too late for Monsieur Werdet to mind what he was about. He had no choice but to lose his credit, or pay at the end of the ten days. He paid; and ten days later, Balzac returned, considerately bringing with him some charming little Viennese curiosities for his esteemed publisher. Monsieur Werdet expressed his acknowledgments; and then politely inquired for the conclusion of Séraphita, and the manuscript of the new novel.

Not a single line of either had been committed to paper.

The farce (undoubtedly a most disgraceful performance, so far as Balzac was concerned) was not played out even yet. The publisher's reproaches seem at last to have awakened the author to something remotely resembling a sense of shame. He promised that Séraphita, which had been waiting at press a whole year, should be finished in one night. There were just two sheets of sixteen pages each to write. They might have been completed either at the author's house or at the publisher's, which was close to the printer's. But, no—it was not in Balzac's character to miss the smallest chance of producing a sensation anywhere. His last caprice was a determination to astonish the printers. Twenty-five compositors were called together at eleven at night, a truckle-bed and table were set up for the author—or, to speak more correctly, for the literary mountebank—in the workshop; Balzac arrived, in a high state of inspiration, to stagger the sleepy journeymen by showing them how fast he could write; and the two sheets were completed magnificently on the spot. By way of fit and proper climax to this ridiculous exhibition of literary quackery, it is only necessary to add, that, on Balzac's own confession, the two concluding sheets of Séraphita had been mentally composed, and carefully committed to memory, two years before he affected to write them impromptu in the printer's office. It seems impossible to deny that the man who could act in this outrageously puerile manner must have been simply mad. But what becomes of the imputation when we remember that this very madman has produced books which, for depth of thought and marvellous knowledge of human nature, are counted deservedly among the glories of French literature, and which were never more living and more lasting works than they are at this moment.

Séraphita was published three days after the author's absurd exhibition of himself at the printer's office. In this novel, as in its predecessor. Louis Lambert, Balzac left his own firm ground of reality, and soared, on the wings of Swedenborg, into an atmosphere of transcendental obscurity impervious to all ordinary eyes. What the book meant, the editor of the periodical in which part of it originally appeared never could explain. Monsieur Werdet, who published it, confesses that he was in the same mystified condition; and the present writer, who has vainly attempted to read it through, desires to add, in this place, his modest acknowledgments of inability to enlighten English readers in the smallest degree on the subject of Séraphita. Luckily for Monsieur Werdet, the author's reputation stood so high with the public, that the book sold prodigiously, merely because it was a book by Balzac. The proceeds of the sale, and the profits derived from new editions of the old novels, kept the sinking publisher from absolute submersion; and might even have brought him safely to land, but for the ever-increasing dead weight of the author's perpetual borrowings, on the security of forthcoming works which he never produced.

No commercial success, no generous self-sacrifice, could keep pace with the demands of Balzac's insatiate vanity and love of show, at this period of his life. He had two establishments, to begin with; both splendidly furnished, and one adorned with a valuable gallery of pictures. He had his box at the French Opera, and his box at the Italian Opera. He had a chariot and horses, and an establishment of men servants. The panels of the carriage were decorated with the arms, and the bodies of the footmen were adorned with the liveries, of the noble family of D'Entragues, to which Balzac persisted in declaring that he was allied, although he never could produce the smallest proof in support of the statement. When he could add no more to the sumptuous magnificence of his houses, his dinners, his carriage, and his servants; when he had filled his rooms with every species of expensive knick-knack; when he had lavished money on all the known extravagances which extravagant Paris can supply to the spendthrift's inventory, he hit on the entirely new idea of providing himself with such a walking-stick as the world had never yet beheld.

His first proceeding was to procure a splendid cane, which was sent to the jeweller's, and was grandly topped by a huge gold knob. The inside of the knob was occupied by a lock of hair presented to the author by an unknown lady admirer. The outside was studded with all the jewels he had bought, and with all the jewels he had received as presents. With this cane, nearly as big as a drum-major's staff, and all ablaze at the top with rubies, diamonds, emeralds, and sapphires, Balzac exhibited himself, in a rapture of satisfied vanity, at the theatres and in the public promenades. The cane became as celebrated in Paris as the author. Madame de Girardin wrote a sparkling little book all about the wonderful walking-stick. Balzac was in the seventh heaven of happiness; Balzac's friends were either disgusted or diverted, according to their tempers. One unfortunate man alone suffered the inevitable penalty of this insane extravagance: need it be added that his name was Werdet?

The end of the connection between the author and the publisher was now fast approaching. All entreaties or reproaches addressed to Balzac failed in producing the slightest result. Even confinement in a sponging-house, when creditors discovered, in course of time, that they could wait no longer, passed unheeded as a warning. Balzac only borrowed more money the moment the key was turned on him, gave a magnificent dinner in prison, and left the poor publisher, as usual, to pay the bill. He was extricated from the sponging-house before he had been there quite three days; and, at that time, he had spent over twenty guineas on luxuries which he had not a farthing of his own to purchase. It is useless, it is even exasperating, to go on accumulating instances of this sort of mad and cruel prodigality: let us advance rapidly to the end. One morning, Monsieur Werdet balanced accounts with his author, from the beginning, and found, in spite of the large profits produced by the majority of the works, that fifty-eight thousand francs were (to use his own expression) paralyzed in his hands by the life Balzac persisted in living; and that fifty-eight thousand more might soon be in the same condition, if he had possessed them to advance. A rich publisher might have contrived to keep his footing in such a crisis as this, and to deal, for the time to come, on purely commercial grounds. But Monsieur Werdet was a poor man; he had relied on Balzac's verbal promises when he ought to have exacted his written engagements: and he had no means of appealing to the author's love of money by dazzling prospects of bank-notes awaiting him in the future, if he chose honestly to earn his right to them. In short, there was but one alternative left, the alternative of giving up the whole purpose and ambition of the bookseller's life, and resolutely breaking off his ruinous connection with Balzac.

Reduced to this situation, driven to bay by the prospect of engagents falling due which he had no apparent means of meeting, Monsieur Werdet answered the next application for an advance by a flat refusal, and followed up that unexampled act of self-defence by speaking his mind at last, in no measured terms, to his illustrious friend. Balzac turned crimson with suppressed anger, and left the room. A series of business formalities followed, iniated by Balzac, with the view of breaking off the connection between his publisher and himself, now that he found there was no more money to be had; Monsieur Werdet being, on his side, perfectly ready to "sign, seal, and deliver," as soon as his claims were properly satisfied in due form of law.

Balzac had now but one means of meeting his liabilities. His personal reputation was gone; but his literary reputation remained as high as ever, and he soon found a publisher, with large capital at command, who was ready to treat for his copyright. Monsieur Werdet had no resource but to sell, or be bankrupt. He parted with all the valuable copyrights for a sum of sixty thousand and odd francs, which sufficed to meet his most pressing engagements. Some of the less popular and less valuable books he kept, to help him, if possible, through his daily and personal liabilities. As for gaining any absolute profit, or even holding his position as a publisher, the bare idea of securing either advantage was dismissed as an idle dream. The purpose for which he had toiled so hard and suffered so patiently was sacrificed forever, and he was reduced to beginning life again as a country traveller for a prosperous publishing house. So far as his main object in existence was concerned, Balzac had plainly and literally ruined him. It is impossible to part with Monsieur Werdet, imprudent and credulous as he appears to have been, without a strong feeling of sympathy, which becomes strengthened to something like positive admiration when we discover that he cherished, in after life, no unfriendly sentiments toward the man who had treated him so shamefully; and when we find him, in the Memoir now under notice, still trying hard to make the best of Balzac's conduct, and still writing of him in terms of affection and esteem in the very end of the book.

The remainder of Balzac's life was, in substance, merely the lamentable repetition of the personal faults and follies, and the literary merits and triumphs, which have already found their record on these pages. The extremes of idle vanity and unprincipled extravagance still alternated, to the last, with the extremes of hard mental labor and amazing mental productiveness. Though he found new victims among new men, he never again met with so generous and forbearing a friend as the poor publisher whose fortunes he had destroyed. The women, whose impulses in his favor were kept alive by their admiration of his books, clung to their spoilt darling to the last—one of their number even stepping forward to save him from a debtors' prison, at the heavy sacrifice of paying the whole demand against him out of her own purse. In all cases of this sort, even where men were concerned as well as women, his personal means of attraction, when he chose to exert them, strengthened immensely his literary claims on the sympathy and good-will of others. He appears to have possessed in the highest degree those powers of fascination which are quite independent of mere beauty of face and form, and which are perversely and inexplicably bestowed in the most lavish abundance on the most unprincipled of mankind. Poor Monsieur Werdet can only account for half his own acts of indiscretion by declaring that his eminent friend wheedled him into committing them. Other and wiser men kept out of Balzac's way, through sheer distrust of themselves. Virtuous friends who tried hard to reform him, retreated from his presence, declaring that the reprobate whom they had gone to convert had all but upset their moral balance in a morning's conversation. An eminent literary gentleman, who went to spend the day with him to talk over a proposed work, rushed out of the house after a two hours' interview, exclaiming piteously: "The man's imagination is in a state of delirium—his talk has set my brain in a whirl—he would have driven me mad if I had spent the day with him!" If men were influenced in this way, it is not wonderful that woman (whose self-esteem was delicately flattered by the prominent and fascinating position which they hold in all his books) should have worshipped a man who publicly and privately worshipped them.

His personal appearance would have recalled to English minds the popular idea of Friar Tuck—he was the very model of the conventional fat, sturdy, red faced, jolly monk. But he had the eye of a man of genius, and the tongue of a certain infernal personage, who may be broadly hinted at, but who must on no account be plainly named. The Balzac candlestick might be clumsy enough; but when once the Balzac candle was lit, the moths flew into it, only too readily, from all points of the compass.

The last important act of his life was, in a worldly point of view, one of the wisest things he ever did. The lady who invited him to Vienna, and whom he called Carissima, was the wife of a wealthy Russian nobleman. On the death of her husband, she practically asserted her admiration of her favorite author, by offering him her hand and fortune. Balzac accepted both; and returned to Paris (from which respect for his creditors had latterly kept him absent) a married man, and an enviable member of the wealthy class of society. A splendid future now opened before him—but it opened too late. Arrived at the end of his old course, he just saw the new career beyond him, and dropped on the threshold of it. The strong constitution which he had remorselessly wasted for more than twenty years past gave way at length, at the very time when his social chances looked most brightly. Three months after his marriage, Honoré de Balzac died, after unspeakable suffering, of disease of the heart. He was then but fifty years of age. His fond, proud, heart-broken old mother held him in her arms. On that loving bosom he had drawn his first breath. On that loving bosom the weary head sank to rest again, when the wild, wayward, miserable, glorious life was over.—Wilkie Collins.

[For the Californian.]

REGARDING RESTAURANTS.

CALIFORNIA being a country where so many people live at restaurants, the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN would doubtlessly like to know the derivation of the word "restaurateur."

Strange though it may appear, the French pre-eminence in cookery is comparatively modern, and may be traced to England; but it is nevertheless true. The comfort of the English taverns and coffee-houses, which came into vogue towards the end of Queen Anne's reign and reached their apogee during the days of the second George, was so extolled by every traveller who had partaken of their solid hospitality, that at last a great gastronomic mind burst through the shackles of prejudice and routine, and gave to Paris what it had long wanted, a public dining establishment, where a good dinner could be enjoyed in the midst of good society, without the diner being compelled to shake hands with any one, nor eat anything which was not quite agreeable to his palate; in short, a place where a man could choose his dinner, and be always sure, whether it was a moderate or an expensive one, of having it well cooked and well served. The name of this national benefactor, for such he deserves to be called, was Lamy, and he opened his modest salon in one of the dark and narrow passages leading to the Palais Royal, towards the end of the year 1774. Over his door he had the following inscription in kitchen Latin:

"O vos qui stomacho laboratis, accurite,
Et ego vos restauraho."

(O you, whose empty stomachs moan in pain,
Come to me, and I'll restore you again.)

Thence was originated the name "Restaurateur." Two years however, before this time, in 1772, tables-d'hote were provided by the traiteurs-rotisseurs, who then only kept public kitchens for cooking and sending out dinners, which were composed of meat, game, poultry, fish, etc., sent in to them from private houses to be cooked, both of which customs by the way, exist in Paris up to the present time. The establishment of these tables-d'hote was also the result of a happy idea. One of the traiteurs having a commodious room attached to his kitchen, thought he might turn it to advantage by giving a public dinner at a fixed hour, for a small price, to those of his customers who, from a press of business, or any other cause, could not conveniently go to their own homes to dine. The idea was a good one and it prospered; it was adopted by his brother traiteurs, and in a very short time tables-d'hote of every grade became popular; but it was reserved for Lamy to make the great leap to fortune by introducing dinners, (á l'Anglaise á la carte) which at once, as the French phrase it, put every man "dans son assiette," or proper position, by enabling him to choose the dishes which pleased him, and enjoy in the midst of a lively crowd the privacy of his own house. As in everything else, perfection is only arrived at by slow degrees and great patience and exertion; Lamy at the commencement of his enterprise, had a hard battle to fight; the whole body of the traiteurs conspired against him and compelled him to confine himself to the strict letter of the municipal law, which, besides obliging him to open and shut his doors at particularly inconvenient hours, and keep a register of the names and addresses of every one frequenting the house, levying heavy duties on the wines and provisions consumed on the premises, prohibited the use of silver spoons and linen cloths, and exacted that every article he served in his "eating shop" should be upon tables covered with green or jasper-colored oil-cloth. Still he struggled on bravely, and finally triumphed; the municipal restrictions were removed, the "eating shop" was called a restaurant, he made a princely fortune and retired to make way for Robert (the inventor of the famous sauce,) Beauvilliers Béchamel, (another great "saucier,") and at a later time Careme, the fame of whose genius spreading far and near, made the establishments they presided over the resort of the choicest company. To improve the various dishes, many of which were even now imperfectly produced, more gastronomic minds went to work, and their labors meeting on all sides with liberal encouragement from wealthy gourmets of both sexes, a gastronomic college was established, which effectually revolutionized the dinners of Europe, and elevated cookery to a science.

Monsieur Henrion de Pensey, late President of the Court of Cessation, says: "I regard the discovery of a dish as a far more interesting event than the discovery of a star, for we have always stars enough, but we can never have too many dishes; and I shall not regard the sciences as sufficiently honored amongst us until I see a cook in the first class of the Institute."

The establishment of Restaurateurs was a great social fact: before their fortunate advent the enjoyment of delicate cookery was confined solely to the opulent; the Restaurateurs placed it within the reach of almost every one. He who could spend twenty or five-and-twenty francs for his dinner, and knew how to choose his dishes, could dine in one of the first-class salons better than in the palace of a prince; while he who could not afford to launch out so far had for his five, or even three francs, in less pretending establishments, a repast which the resources of his domestic kitchen could not in any way compete with. In fact, the Restaurateurs were the missionaries of civilization, and their efforts did for French cookery what the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries did for literature—they rendered it universal. And this happy, useful reformation, tending to social equality, really had its birth in England, its first nurseries having been the Mitres, Turks' Heads, Cocoa Trees, Will's, Grecians, White's, Buttons, etc., whose glories are so graphically recorded in the pages of the Tattler, the Spectator, and the Guardian, and at a later date in Boswell's Gossipping Life of Doctor Johnson, which latter weighty authority emphatically gave it as his opinion that "a tavern chair was the throne of human felicity."

UNEASY SHAVING. — Johnny Milne's Saturday duty was "duly weekly" to divest his cheeks and chin of the rough stubble which the previous seven days had produced. Another Saturday duty was to provide Sabbath provender for his live stock. And so seriously did Johnny regard the business of shaving generally, that when Saturday came he was wont to declare, in view of the tasks before him, that he would rather "thrash his Sunday strae" than take off his beard. But the thing was not always alike distressing, because the razor was not always the same in point of edge; and so, when a neighbor on one occasion found Johnny lathered to the tip of the nose, and toiling away in his shirt sleeves, the worthy man, with distorted features and tears streaming down his cheeks, poured out the sorrows of his heart in the words: "Oh, mon, aliss; I wudna gie a feg for the loons fitein sticks wi' 'er (with Johnny the razor was feminine,) but fan Janet taks 'er to cut the bread on the griddle, it would play the verra sorra wi' the best razor that ever cam' out o' Willy Coots'. This is awfu'."

John G. Quigley dropped suddenly, in Norwalk, Ohio, the other day, and was supposed to be dead. While being shaved in preparation for the grave, the razor cut his face, setting the blood flowing, whereupon Mr. Quigley arose, put on his clothes, and went about his business. Perhaps the barber used a razor like Johnny Milne's, and that brought the dead man to life. A man must be very dead to be indifferent to it.

THE Empress of Austria has recently introduced a new fashion. It is to have a diamond, representing a dewdrop, fixed to a real flower. A few evenings ago her Majesty had in her hand a bouquet of white camelias, and on each, in the centre, was a large diamond.

LINES TO A PICTURE.

SWEET pledge of woman's trust reposed in me,
Type of a form 'twas never mine to see:
Robed in thy maiden beauty, modest, mute,
List, shadow of the loved one, to my lute.
Methinks thou wond'rest what odd freak of chance
Exposed thy beauties to an unknown glance;
But peace be with thee; nothing may'st thou fear!
Pray do not weep!—Ah, canst thou shed a tear?
Hast thou a heart whence fond emotions flow?
That thrills with gladness and that throbs with woe?
Whence, too, betimes, thy life-drops freely gush,
To heighten charms unequalled with a blush,
Just as the rosy tints of Summer even
Add tenfold spleudor to the Vault of Heaven?
No; thou art void, beyond all mortals blest—
What though Love's arrows never pierced thy breast?
So to thy heart woe never winged its way
Where hope and joy had nestled yesterday.
I've kissed those lips: they quivered not; a breath
Ne'er lifts that bosom, motionless as death.
Thou canst not speak; thou canst not sigh nor smile,
Man ne'er deceived thee; sin cannot beguile.
We pass away, while Nature must endure;
How sad her work's perverted—Man's is pure.
Despite my gloom, my love of life's the same,
Glows in my heart and prompts me to exclaim,
Beautiful shadow, thy lot I deplore,
Sweet nurse of fond remembrance—nothing more.

DICKENS IN HIS YOUTH.—A reporter, competent to tell the anecdote from experience, says: "The most famous shorthandman I remember, 'a long time ago,' was Sandie Fraser, a stanch Scot, since numbered with the dead; but he was a great creature in his way. The fidelity of his notes was perfectly remarkable. Gurney and his men had everything—from a divorce case in Parliament to a House of Commons Committee. Gurney—'Dionysius Ear' of Professor Wilson—made all write the same character; indeed, his workmen had been apprenticed to him, each with a good fee: for if they turned out apt pupils, they were sure of making £500 per annum. This went on a long while, and other shorthand writers arose, 'who knew not Joseph.' Among these first and foremost was Charles Dickens, who was as good as Gurney at twelve years of age. Wonderful aptitude! Charles Dickens was a better-dressed man years afterwards, though still one of the best-dressed men about town, with his Parisian waistcoat, and 'the last rose of summer,' it may be, in his coat when he lectures. Dickens, when he came into the gallery of the House of Commons, had D'Orsay wristbands, fine linen, part and parcel of the inner garment—not 'Piccadilly weepers'—with bullion buttons. Wonder it was to me full many a morning at three o'clock—young Phœbus gilding everything but the faces of those within the House—to see 'Boz' take notes of Palmerston or Peel, or, most difficult of all, Disraeli or Shiel, the fastest speaker the world ever heard of—to see, I say, Dickens take notes of these statesmen at such an hour, with notebook in one hand, sapphire-headed pencil in the other, was one of the most astonishing sights, and he would leave the House the neatest and best man still, while the rest were all showing the signs of the wear and tear of the night."

AMONG the American ladies whom we find chronicled as figuring promineutly at recent distinguished balls in Paris, says the Boudoir, is Miss Adelsdorfer, of California.

FACTS VS. THEORIES.—"Give me a place to rest my lever on," says Archimedes, "and I will move the world." "Give me pure and unadulterated drugs," says Medicus, of the olden time, "and I will cure disease."

In one sense, both of these learned pundits were the veriest charlatans. They knew there was no place to rest their lever on, either to move the world or cure disease. Mechanism was in a backward state, and the medical profession was but another name for sorcery, and all the adjuncts of magic filters and charms of the "evil eye," etc.

But these latter days have borne unto us something more than even superstition and its crew ever dreamt of in their maddest philosophy. In these days of practical science, what was theory of yesterday is fact to-day, and all the old time notions become as bubbles in the sun, and burst and break with every breath we draw.

Let Archimedes shoulder his lever and we will find a resting place for it to move the world. Let mine ancient Medicus pant and toil no more for the drugs be so sorely needs, for we have them at our hand, ever ready to serve them at his beck.

Refined in the laboratory of Dr. Maggiel, the finest materials known in the medical profession are obtainable by any one. His Bilious, Dyspeptic, and Diarrhea Pills stand unrivalled, and his Salve operates with magical effect upon burns, scalds, and all sores and ulcers of the skin.

In fact, we think MAGGIEL'S Pills and Salve are the wonder of this century, and we are happy in the thought that many others of our brethren of the craft agree with us. We would earnestly counsel that all families provide themselves with Dr. Maggiel's Preparations at once, and keep them ready at hand, so as to use them at the most opportune time and as occasion serves.—Valley Sentinel. *

HUSH.

"I CAN scarcely hear," she murmured,
"For my heart beats loud and fast,
But surely, in the far, far distance,
I can hear a sound at last."
"It is only the reapers singing,
As they carry home their sheaves;
And the evening breeze has risen,
And rustles the dying leaves."

"Listen! there are voices talking,"
Calmly still she strove to speak,
Yet her voice grew faint and trembling,
And the red flushed in her cheek.
"It is only the children playing
Below, now their work is done,
And they laugh that their eyes are dazzled
By the rays of the setting sun."

Fainter grew her voice, and weaker,
As with anxious eyes she cried,
"Down the avenue of chestnuts,
I can hear a horseman ride."
"It was only the deer that were feeding
In a herd on the clover-grass,
They were startled, and fled to the thicket,
As they saw the reapers pass."

Now the night arose in silence,
Birds lay in their leafy nest,
And the deer couched in the forest,
And the children were at rest:
There was only a sound of weeping
From watchers around a bed,
But Rest to the weary spirit,
Peace to the quiet Dead!

A LIFE SAVED.

A SUNDAY SCENE IN HANGTOWN.

ON the road leading from Sutter's Mill, or Coloma, to the historic town of Placerville, formerly Hangtown, a party of four men were tramping somewhat wearily towards the latter place. It was a bright February morning in 185—, such as is only seen in California during the dry intervals in the rainy season. The month of January had been very wet, but during the two weeks preceding this particular morning no rain had fallen. Consequently the roads were dry. The air was soft and full of fragrance; grass, flowers, and foliage were seen in the most lavish abundance and of the brightest hues. Nature beamed upon the wayfarers in her gayest and most attractive aspect. The names of the four men were John Bloomer, Aleck Jones, Edward Pym, and Joseph Ricks. They were afoot and some of them were footsore.

Two mules were suddenly espied, quietly grazing on the banks of the South Fork of the Rio Americano. Two of the party determined to rest themselves by a ride. Against the remonstrance of the other two they advanced and secured the hybrids. The nose-ropes served them as bridle reins, and some pieces of rope, which were "lying around loose," were quickly fashioned into stirrups. The improvised equestrians then mounted and jogged along rejoicing. Soon afterwards the party was joined by a solitary pedestrian on his way to the Georgetown mines from Sacramento City. The newcomer was unknown to the others and knew them not. His name was Harry Norton and he hailed from Cincinnati. As he also intended to stop at Hangtown, and was socially inclined, Norton gladly joined the other party and trudged with them cheerfully along the dusty road, full of pleasant anticipations. Harry knew nothing of the affair of the mules, but supposed the animals to be the legal property of the occupying parties. The outstretching suburbs of the town with the ominous name were reached, and the party halted for rest in the midst of a beautiful little grove of live oaks, through which the dusty, rust-colored road meandered. The mules were turned loose and started back in the direction of the place whence they were taken.

Before they were out of sight the clattering sound of galloping hoofs was heard and soon some new characters appeared upon the scene. A score of mounted men came noisily into view from the thick dust-clouds kicked up by their impatiently spurred mustangs. "We've got 'em! Hurrah! The thieves are caught!" These were the exclamations uttered by the leaders of the troop. In a twinkling Bloomer, Jones, Pym, Ricks, and Norton were surrounded, secured, and pinioned. They were all—mules and men included—then driven with much profanity and many threats, into the centre of the town. A mass meeting of the citizens of Hangtown was at once called. The call was immediately responded to. The meeting was held on Preachers' Hill. I was there.

Preachers' Hill was a commanding eminence from which occasional itinerants delivered Sunday sermons to such as would lend them their ears. The hill was truly a romantic spot. It was beautiful with umbrageous oaks that studded the long slope. It was majestic with stately pines that crowned the rounded summit. It was picturesque with clustering masses of intervening mansanitas. A grassy carpet richly variegated with the multitudinous hues of countless varieties of flowers, swept softly over the undulating slope. A sparkling rivulet, not yet contaminated by the washings from cradles, long-toms, and sluices, meandered musically over a bed of pebbly quartz adown the hill. Birds sung joyfully upon the tree-boughs and zephyrs murmured soothingly through the tree-tops. The bright sunlight shone out gloriously from the clear blue sky. It filtered through the foliage and fell aslant upon the flower-covered openings and vistas, and lay all tangled up with the quivering shadows of leaves and twigs, in checkered, ever-changing pictures of green and gold. The snow-capped, glittering cones of the Sierra Nevada Mountains ambitiously pierced the azure arch in the distant east. Over the South Fork and beyond the Rio Americano, the Sacramento river gleamed like a thread of silver through the low-land of level verdure that stretched away to the hazy limits of the western tide water. The whole formed a picture of natural beauty long to be remembered.

It was peaceful, eye-delighting and spirit-soothing. The arching sky seemed to bend down and enclose the scene in an embrace of love and mercy. "Peace on earth and good will to men" breathed in every bird-note, in the hum of insects, in the rustling leaves and the tinkle of the streamlets. Peace reigned everywhere save in the hearts of men. There was no good will in the excited multitude assembled that beautiful Sabbath afternoon on the romantic slope of Preachers' Hill. The mass meeting was called to order and organized. A jury of twelve "honest miners" was picked out, counsel selected and judge appointed. The five travelers were placed beneath a spreading oak and accused of the capital crime of theft. Two miners from Coloma were the accusers. The prosecuting attorney, or "people's lawyer," a florid young man with an eye to the office of County Judge, then opened the case for the people. "Are those your mules, gentlemen?" he said to the claimants. They proved their legal ownership of the animals. "Were they stolen from you?" "Yes." "By the prisoners?" "Yes; we missed the mules, reckoned they had been stolen, collected the neighbors, found the right trail, overtook the thieves, captured them and recovered the property. There were no witnesses for the defense. The people's attorney then addressed the jury. "Gentlemen, you have heard the evidence. It is overwhelming. There is no doubt of their guilt. There is but one penalty for the crime of horse, or mule stealing. You all know what that is. The voice of the people has already pronounced sentence upon all such criminals. It is death. It is the duty of the jury to reiterate that verdict in this case. Gentlemen of the jury, I demand of you that you do your duty." The counsel for the defense had nothing to say. He was a shrewd store-keeper and saw that the current of popular opinion had set fatally against the accused. He did not dare to say a word in defense. Some of the prisoners had made several attempts to speak but had been peremptorily silenced. The judge now turned to them and asked if they had anything to say before the jury rendered their verdict. The innocent stranger stated the facts in regard to himself in a manner that convinced me, at least, that his story was true. The other four corroborated his statement. The two men who had taken the mules, declared that they had merely done so temporarily; that they had afterwards turned them loose and started them homewards; that the idea of stealing never occurred to them, as they thought the mules were stray animals and there would be no harm, they imagined, in riding them a little. The other two testified that the mules were taken against their urgent remonstrances and without their consent. This the mule-takers admitted to be true. The judge, upon the conclusion of the prisoners' statements, made his charge to the jury. It was all on one side of course, against the prisoners, and in favor of hanging them all forthwith. As for him, he did not believe anything in the statement of the accused except the fact of taking the animals. He was satisfied that they were all equally guilty and he instructed the jury to bring in a verdict accordingly. They did so without stirring from their seats upon a prostrate pine tree; their verdict rung out loud and clear, as with one voice: "Guilty." "Against all of the accused?" queried the judge. "Against all," chorused the jury. "Gentlemen of the jury and you my fellow citizens," to the crowd, "what shall be the penalty for the crime of which these fellows stand convicted!" "Death." "Hang them"' "Hang them." Hang them," yelled the excited mob. "Up with them at once!" "Ropes, ropes!"

In an instant a dozen ropes, already noosed, came whirling, lasso-fashion, over the heads of the crowd and fell at the feet of the doomed men. They were not hoodwinked, their hands were bound at the wrists, their feet were left free. Scores of dexterous hands adjusted the halters around their necks and flung the other ends of the lariats over two sturdy horizontal branches of old oak, that stretched out at right angles with each other. John Bloomer, Aleck Jones, and Joseph Ricks were placed beneath the largest limb, Edward Pym and Harry Norton, the stranger, were stationed under the other, which extended over the southwestern slope. Hundreds grasped the hauling ends of the ropes. "Five minutes are allowed you in which to say your prayers," said the "Lynching" Judge to the prisoners, taking out a ponderous old silver time piece. The minutes flew rapidly. "Time's up," cried the judge. "Haul taut," shouted a sailor-like voice, and quick as thought Bloomer, Jones, and Ricks were pulled up from the ground until their necks were jammed tightly against the oaken branches twenty feet above. Four or five feet of "fall" was then given to each by an artistic slacking up followed immediately by a sudden jerk. The ropes were then fastened to a convenient tree and the poor fellows hanging at the other ends were left to strangle at leisure.

Let us now return to Edward Pym and Harry Norton. I had stood during the proceedings of the mock trial whittling a piece of pine wood with a small sharp knife, in the immediate vicinity of the latter, had watched him narrowly and was thoroughly convinced of his innocence. When the noosed lariats came whirling to the foot of the gallows-tree I managed to busy myself with the one intended for Norton's neck. No lyncher more officious than I was near the tree. I helped to adjust his noose, and when I finally took my hands from it there was a deep cut on the inner side, close to the knot. This cut could not be seen, although so deep that a small strain would serve to break the remaining strand. At the same time my knife passed with keen rapidity across the under part of the lashings that bound his hands together. As I stepped aside I whispered softly, yet loud enough for him to hear: "I've cut your noose and lashings; free your hands and neck and 'git' if you can." He understood me. At that moment the order to "haul taut" was given. Norton, by a vigorous effort, burst the half-cut cords around his wrist, tore the noose from his neck, struck out like a pugilist right and left, levelled two of the self-elected executioners to the earth, seized a rifle from a third, knocked down half a dozen more with a sweep of the clubbed end of the weapon, dropped it and darted down the hill with the speed of a "quarter horse!"

Pym, who was to be hung with Norton, went up from the ground at the word. He was a heavy man. When about six feet from the earth the rope broke. Down he came. He staggered a little but quickly recovered and rushed off close in the rear of Norton. A score of rifles were instantly brought to a score of shoulders. A score of eyes ranged along as many rifle-sights. Twenty explosions blended in one ringing report. Twenty death-dealing tubes flashed out their missiles. Ten bullets pierced poor Pym through and through. He sprung wildly up six feet in air and without a word fell to the ground—dead before he struck it. The mob raised a fierce, exulting shout. Nine of the bullets missed their mark. The twentieth passed through the upper muscles of Norton's left arm. Heedless of the stinging pain he maintained his headlong flight. A deep, narrow ravine, about a rod in width, run along the foot of the hill. The further bank was a little lower than its opposite. Towards this chasm Norton ran. Reaching the edge he bounded into the air, cleared the yawning space beautifully and landed in the midst of a clump of mansanita bushes, at least a yard beyond the brink. A saddled and bridled mustang, the property of the people's lawyer on the hill, was hitched close by to a stake in the road. To unhitch, mount and dash off at full speed was the work of a moment. Away he went down the Coloma road, with the greater portion of the mob in full chase, yelling, cursing, and shooting in the direction in horrible chorus. Luckily a good many minutes slipped away before any of his pursuers could find and mount their horses.

The fugitive and his pursuers passed over the ground trodden by the former previous to the capture. On he went like the wind, with forty or fifty would-be lynchers thundering after him with the ferocity of bloodhounds. Ten miles of ground were quickly dashed over. This brought Norton to the junction of the main road with a bridle-path along which he had passed in the morning. A log cabin stood here. At this cabin he had asked and obtained a cup of water from a very pretty "Buckeye" girl, the daughter of old man Phillips, one of the pioneers of that section. Just as he reached the junction the fugitive's horse stumbled, and Norton, weak from the bleeding of his wound, was thrown off. The fair occupant of the cabin was standing in the door. Norton fell right at her feet. She helped him to rise. He was weak from the loss of blood, but unhurt by the fall. Norton had not strength enough left to mount again, and the reeking mustang took a roll in the dust which slightly damaged his saddle, and then proceeded quietly to nibble the tender grass by the roadside. "What is the trouble, sir?" asked the girl. He told her briefly. "I reckon there's somebody else knows a little about this matter," she said in reply. "I know you are not guilty of stealing the animals: I think we can satisfy these bloodthirsty gentlemen in regard to your case, at least." Miss Phillips then seized an old fashioned tin dinner-horn, and sent out a long, loud, waveriug blast that reverberated among the adjacent hills as though the combined trumpeters of an army corps were sounding an alarm. "That will call father and my brothers," she said. The maiden then applied a hasty dressing to the wounded arm, her soft blue eyes beaming with sympathy, and her bright red lips uttering words of condolence.

By the time she had finished, the pursuing horsemen came up one side and her father and brothers on the other. The former had dwindled away in the chase to half a score. The Phillips party consisted of the stalwart old man and his six sturdy sons, all of them six feet high and powerful in proportion. The leader of the pursuing party, also the chief officiator in the tragedy on the hill, a big ruffianly fellow who had never owned a horse or mule in his life, dismounted and strode up to the porch, within which Norton was sitting, sick, pale, and weak. "Come out of that, you dog-goned thief; I allow ou'll ornament yon tree in less than three shakes of a coon's tail," said he, and stepped in to grasp his victim. "Staud back, you big cowardly brute," exclaimed Miss Phillips, rushing between them; "back with you, you've no business here. This man is no mule stealer, as I can prove, and that's what you can't do for yourself, Tim. Stevens!" Tim. persisted with much profanity, when the courageous girl raised the ponderous dinner-horn and brought it down on his head with a force that made him stagger. "Hold on," shouted the old man Phillips; "what's all this about? Mary, explain. Gentlemen, stand back," he said to the pursuers, who were rushing in. "Boys," to his sons, "keep the peace here! Mary, go on."

Mary briefly recounted the proceedings of the day as told her by Norton. "And now, father, look at this poor man and see if you recognize him." "Why, I'm blessed if he isn't the young fellow who passed here this morning and got a drink of water from you, Mary," said the father. "Boys, you all saw him?" The Phillips boys all answered in the affirmative. "Now, gentlemen," said Phillips, "listen to me a minute. We were all at dinner when this young man came up the path, which leads from the Sacramento to the Coloma road, you know. We saw him when he came over yonder knoll about a mile away. He halted here and asked for some water, which Mary gave him. He declined our invitation to stop and take a bite with us, saying that he was in a hurry to reach Hangtown. Some time before he came in sight we noticed four men and two mules coming down the mountain there," —about four miles distant, in a directly opposite direction. "It was impossible for this man and the others to have met to-day before the mules were taken." Mary and her brothers confirmed their father's statement.

"Gentlemen," said the old man, "I think there has been blood enough spilt for one day and two mules. You had better go home and leave us to take care of this young man." "That's exactly my opinion," said Mary, "go home and see if there is no innocent blood upon your hands. Some of you 'gentlemen' live in very brittle glass houses and had better be careful how you pitch rocks about!" The "gentlemen" all acquiesed in the evidence and advice of Phillips except Tim. Stevens, who swore that he would have Norton hung for running away upon the "people's" lawyer's mustang! "Git," said young George Phillips to Timothy, "git up and git!" The disappointed ruffian strode sullenly towards his borrowed horse. As he passed Mary he applied an insulting epithet to her, and she struck him smartly with the tin horn. The fellow stopped, doubled his bony fist, and deliberately knocked her down! All present saw the deed, but Norton was the first to act. He siezed a revolver and in spite of his weakness rushed to the spot. Stevens saw him coming, drew his pistol and fired three shots—all of which missed—before Norton had time to adjust his weapon. Tim. fired a fourth shot which clipped off a lock of Harry's hair. Norton advanced as rapidly as weakness would permit, aimed and fired just as Stevens was turning to run. Tim. saved his life at the cost of his sight. Norton's shot scraped across both eyeballs, tearing away the greater portion of the nose, and the wretch tumbled yelling to the dust, in total blindness. The impromptu duel was pronounced a "fair transaction" by its witnesses, especially on the part of Norton. The blind and bleeding Timothy was placed upon his horse and sustained there by two of his comrades, and the "gentlemen" returned to Haugtown wiser if not better men.

Norton fainted from weakness as soon as his quondam Lynch-law expounders had departed. Mary caught him in her strong but shapely arms as he fell, and he was conveyed to a comfortable couch in the cabin. He was nursed by the sympathizing maiden and cared for by her father and brothers with all the tenderness that his condition demanded.

When the Lynchers reached Hangtown Tim. was examined by Dr. Smith, who found that both eyes were entirely destroyed and the nose nearly all blown off.

One of the returned "gentlemen" made a speech and gave an account of the pursuit, the overtaking, the unexpected evidence, the insult, and the duel. The citizens received it as satisfactory and dispersed. Their craving for excitement was appeased. Three men had been hung, one shot to death, a fifth badly wounded, and another made blind for life. Enough for one day surely; sufficient to last them until the next Sunday, at least!

The next day I rode out to the cabin, and took with me, as trophies, Norton's wrist lashings and noose, which I had secured immediately after his down hill dash. He received them with pleasure, thanked me heartily for my aid, for the life I had saved, and vowed he would keep the articles through life in memory of me and as mementos of the most terrible episode of his existence.

Norton was a handsome man and he soon found favor in the eyes of Mary Phillips. He had loved her from the moment she had interposed in his behalf. It turned out, too, that old man Phillips and Norton's father were old friends. Harry obtained the consent of Mary's father to wed his daughter whenever she was ready. She was ready and willing, too, about six months afterwards. I "stood up" at the wedding, as groomsman, with the only young lady to be found within a circuit of several miles. A happier pair than Harry Norton and Mary his wife were never matched, never, at least, within the scope of my observation. Four years afterwards the whole family retired from the mines, with moderate fortunes, to San Francisco, where they still live, holding positions in society among the most honored and prosperous of the residents of that beautiful "Bay City."—"The Doctor's Club," in the New York Atlas.

THE EARTH AS SEEN FROM THE MOON.

THE inhabitants of the moon perceive in their sky a gigantic star, constantly immovable at the same height. To their eyes this globe is twelve times as large as the sun, but it differs from all the stars in being always suspended in the same place over their heads. It presents phases to them as the moon does to us, passing through all the gradations of new and full earth. This star, as we have just said, is the earth we inhabit.

Those who dwell in the centre of the lunar disk behold our globe suspended from their zenith, hovering eternally in the midst of the starry skies. Others see it at 70 degrees of elevation, others at 45 degrees, as they inhabit spots more or less removed from the centre of the visible hemisphere. Those who live near the border of this hemisphere, see our globe on their horizon resting on the mountains. A little further on only half the earth is discernible, and in passing to another hemisphere the view vanishes forever.

If we except the determination of longitudes, the earth is more beautiful and useful to the moon than the moon is to the earth; and if the Selinites, or inhabitants of the moon, rolling underneath us, interpret the law of final causes with as much partiality as we do, they will have a right apparently superior to our own for regarding creation, the earth included, as especially made for the Selenian race.

The earth is a gigantic globe, sending them thirteen times more light than the full moon transmits to us. It revolves on its axis in twenty-four hours, and during this period exhibits all portions of its surface, being thus more generous than the moon, which always conceals one hemisphere from our view. In consequence of this motion, the Selenite finds himself in an observatory magnificently situated for viewing the terrestrial disk, and his position is preferable to that of the inhabitants of the first 4 moons of Saturn, who can never see the whole of that planet; and they can see the earth better than we see any planet.

The earth generally presents to them a greenish hue, in consequence of the immense quantity of water by which its surface is covered, of the forests of the new world, and of its plains, and also on account of the tint of its atmosphere. From time to time, however, large grey or yellow spots divide the sphere. To the east of the terrestrial disk appear the lofty Cordilleras, marked by a long indented line just as we see in the lunar Carpathians, to the west of the Sea of Storms. Opposite this ridge, a shady green spot of great extent unfolds itself for many hours; this is the great ocean. Next comes two grey patches, which look like one elongated; these are the two isles of New Zealand. Then appears the fine continent of Australia, tinted with a thousand colors, and accompanied by New Guinea, Borneo, Java, and the Philippines. At the same time the grey country of Asia is unrolled, and extends to the white steppes of the pole. Africa then comes in view, divided by its milky way of sand. To the north of the great Sahara, appears a little green spot torn in all directions and full of ramifications; this is the Mediterranean; above which those who have good eyesight will discern little, and almost invisible, France (!). Then the dry land will disappear, and the great dark spot of the Atlantic will follow the same revolving course. The Selinites who carelessly contemplate in tranquil nights the green and grey divisions of the earth, will have no idea of the contests in which the distant nationalities are involved.

The earth is a permanent clock to the inhabitants of the moon, and this is not its least utility. By reason of its invariable movements, the fixed points which mark the different longitudes will be the hours on the meridian of the moon. Each country of the globe has its peculiar aspect, and may serve for point of departure.

The phases the earth presents to the moon will, in the same manner, serve as an almanac, and we may believe they form its chief foundation. These phases are complementary to those which the moon presents to us; when it is in full moon to us it is new earth for the Selenites; and when they give us a new moon, we offer them a full earth. No reciprocity can be more perfect and constant.

But the phases of the earth differ essentially from those of the moon, inasmuch as their intensity, not their magnitude, changes perpetually. This phenomenon is very terrestrial, and we may be sure the Selenites have judged us by it long ago. Whilst with them all is calm, identical, constant; with us everything changes. Besides the different lustre of different parts of the terrestrial spheres—green continents, blue seas, yellow deserts, white poles, and grey lands—our atmosphere is in perpetual commotion. One day it is covered with clouds, and transmits to the moon a uniform white light; the day after it is of limpid transparency, and allows the solar light to fall upon absorbent green surfaces. All of a sudden it will be varied with floeculent mountains and varied mosaics. Thus the light the Selenites receive from the earth—the light which we call "ashy," and which we only perceive in the moon's early days—varies continually in intensity.

This mobility, this perpetual variation in the aspect of the earth, will have made the Selenites believe that the earth is uninhabited. But on what grounds would they form opinions unfavorable to its habitability? They live on a solid and stable sphere, and can see nothing like it on earth. Can any rational creature live upon that permanent atmospheric layer which covers all the earth? A Seleuite who fell into it would be drowned. Can it be on that sheet of green that washes the greater portion of the earth? Can it be on those clouds that appear and disappear a hundred times a day? And then the earth turns with such velocity, it is subject to so much elemental instability! Moreover, can we believe that its inhabitants are people without weight, preserving, no one knows how, a mean position between the fixed and mobile elements? How can such existence be believed?—Cosmos.

FRAMING PRINTS.—Having observed in your colums some time ago a correspondence relative to the best mode of framing prints, may I beg your insertion of the following hints, which may prove useful. I have just removed a number of prints from their frames, in which they have been for at least sixty years, but probably for a longer period. None of them have suffered damage, owing to the following precautions having been taken. The glass of each frame is laid in with a composition like plaster, blackened to suit the dark frames; and, besides this, glass is pasted all round inside to the frame with a narrow strip of paper. Within the glass is the gilt moulding, which thus serves to keep the print and the glass a quarter of an inch apart. The print, being attached by its edges, or its corners, to the backboard, is put in over the gilt moulding, and the whole of the back securely pasted over with strong paper. The only prints I found to have turned yellow were those which were pasted on to canvas stretchers. This was probably caused by the paste.

I may add the following hints from my own experience. Prints (unlike oil-paintings,) if they are to be hung up, must have a glass over them, and be secured against the entrance of dust, flies, and damp. The paste to be used for all prints and drawings should be shoemakers' paste, which has, I believe, alum in it; and besides, not breeding insects, will attach paper to wood thoroughly. The putty, paste, etc., used must be quite dried after each part of the process of framing, before proceeding to paste up the back. The print itself must be also thoroughly dried. I believe that the spotty mildew often seen on mezzotints and dark etchings is as liable to come in portfolios as in glazed frames, and may have something to do with the ink; at the same time I do not think it would appear except where it is aided by damp.—Correspondent of the Athenæum.

THE THIEVING PASSION.—The wife of a celebrated physician at Leyden, never went into a shop to buy anything without stealing; and a countess at Frankfort had the same propensity. Another lady, notwithstanding all the care with which she had been brought up, had the same desire to pilfer. You will find it related of a physician, that his wife was always obliged to examine his pockets in the evening, and restore to his patients the things she found there. He always took something as well as his fee. Meritz speaks of a criminal who, at the moment he was about to be executed, stole the confessor's snuff-box. Dr. Burner, who was one of the physicians to the King of Bavaria, speaks of a person who had enjoyed abundance, and had been well educated, but who, notwithstanding, was always stealing; and was made a soldier by his father, and at last got hanged.

AFTER a successful attack on the royal party, in 1745, a Highlander had gained a watch as his share of the spoils of the vanquished. Unacquainted with its use, he listened with equal surprise and pleasure to the ticking sound; after a few hours, however, the watch ran down, the noise ceased, and the dispirited owner determined to conceal the misfortune which had befallen it, and to dispose of it to the first person who offered him a trifle in exchange. He soon met with a customer; but, at parting, he could not conceal his triumph, and exultingly exclaimed, "Why, she died last night!"

"FELLOW CITIZENS!"

HENCEFORTH, when the orator mounts the stump upon the glorious Fourth, and with swinging arms saws the air in spasmodic gesticulation, as he opens his address to the assembled intelligence and beauty of the burgh with the endearing, though scarcely original phrase which forms the heading of this article, he will address a larger audience than ever before. The exact number of negroes and Chinamen that have been gathered into the national fold by the passage of the Civil Rights Bill we do not know, for the census returns are not at hand, and we have no volume of statistics before us, but, as Toots says, "it's of no consequence." The more the merrier, of course, but a million or two more or less makes no material difference. The aux armes citoyens, of the French Marseillaise, can be construed liberally in the American adaptation into "come to our arms, citizens," for the edict has gone forth, and we are all equal in the eye of the law.

Two hundred guns on Wednesday evening shook the environing hills with their thunder, and with the treble bass of their deep reverberations woke the echoes until every cellar found a voice and answered back. And was there not cause that pæans should go up and that the city should be loud with rejoicing? Think of the accession which the ranks of our citizens have received. Are not the moon-eyed plunged into our arms, fragrant as summer and twice as bland? Should there not be joy in the land, when a golden age is at hand surpassing in the full effulgence of its splendor any millennium that the mind of man, kindled by enthusiasm, has ever ventured to portray? For what is the lying down together of the lamb and the lion, compared to the sweet repose, side by side, of the Caucasian and the Mongolian, to say nothing of the Ethiopian? Who for the future will venture to speak disrespectfully of that "ancient and fishlike smell" which pervades Sacramento street, and floats up like the smoke of a swung censer from those portions of Jackson and Dupont streets where Chinamen most do congregate? Who henceforth will advocate the removal of the bazaars and lazars of the Quartier Chinois to the suburbs along with the slaughter-houses for which a site is so earnestly sought? Shall we move citizens out of the city? Far from it! We do not mean that they should be moved from it, but that the thought should be a distant one from the mind of any advocate of equal rights and an opening of the elective franchise to all.

The difference between civil rights and civil wrongs is not always very broadly traced nor very clearly defined, but in the matter of the bill which Congress has just seen fit to pass over the President's veto, no question can arise. The idea that Chinamen are barred out from the privileges guaranteed by it to every other race and color is absurd in the extreme It was once decided that the little phrase in the Declaration of Independence, about all men being born free and equal, was not intended to apply to negroes. But we do not see why a document which declares that "INHABITANTS, of every race and color, etc., shall have the same right, etc.," should be construed as barring out Chinamen. Certainly they are our fellow citizens, and if we do not appreciate the blessing of having them with us and of us now, the probabilities are that we shall when the cholera comes—an epidemic which they are specially entitled to share with us, since to them belongs the credit of inviting and introducing it here.

The selfish regrets of the up country papers, which were accustomed to remark, when a Chinaman shuffled off his mortal cue and coil, "By this unfortunate affair the county loses four dollars a month," are ended. Foreigners no longer, no miners' tax can be levied on them, for they have equal rights with us in everything, including mineral lands and the Fourth of July. And that they have a right to vote who can deny, for clearly enough, if a man has a right to slip into a Senator's seat or the Presidential chair, he has a right to slip a ballot into a box. It were unfair to shut our fellow citizens out from any rights which we ourselves have, and we insist upon swinging the doors widely open to them—even to the extent of a place in our municipal councils, if any ambitious one among them is desirous of becoming Supervisor or Mayor. For, otherwise, they will consider us their mean fellow citizens, in spite of the Civil Rights Bill.

A QUESTION OF PRECEDENCE.

PARIS, at the present time, if the reports of correspondents and the assertions of its own journals may be believed, claims for itself the bad pre-eminence of being the most corrupt city upon the face of the globe. The demi-monde has extended its lines so broadly and boldly within the domain of the beau-monde that it is now extremely difficult to say where the one ends and the other begins. Never celebrated for its virtue, Paris formerly had some reputation for discretion and propriety, all of which seems now to have been blown to the winds. In the new era that has been inaugurated all former land-marks and distinctions of society are set aside, and the boundary of dress is alone recognized. The carriage of Aspasia rolls along the Bois de Boulogne, attended by all the jeunesse-dorée of the day, and the envy of the French matron is excited to such a degree that her own equipage is ordered out, and she takes the field, not content to outshine in the pure lustre of virtue but determined to outblaze in diamonds, dress, and all the lurid lights which now go to make up the full, flaming fire of success. Nor is it deemed enough to pattern from afar off, studying manners and morals from a distance: a closer intimacy is desired, and matrons actually rest uneasily until they have an opportunity of rubbing shoulders with these successful strumpets, as though, by so doing, they could become possessed of that loadstone power of attraction which they can scarcely understand but are so eager to acquire. The bals-masqués of the demi-monde are attended, if report may be believed, not only by the young men of Paris, but by their mothers and sisters as well.

The stage, always a reflector of the morals of the age, tells the story plainly enough. The success of an actress is in direct ratio to the shapeliness of her figure and the freedom with which she exhibits it; histrionic ability, under the present régime, contributing about as many elements to fame and fortune as the reputation of being a virtuous wife and mother would. Indeed, it is actresses, opera dancers, and singers who have usurped the throne which ladies of position, if not of birth, once occupied, giving tone to society, making the slang of the coulisses the language of drawing-rooms, and exciting the envy of women as well as the admiration of men.

The picture is not so pleasant in detail that we design to dwell upon it at length. It is simply with the intention of pointing a moral for the contemplation of our own community that we have ventured to allude to it at all. It might be remarked that with the aptitude which we possess for borrowing from Paris, importing habits of thought and expression as well as of dress, our own society is travelling in a like direction. But no such reflection was intended, though it is one which naturally suggests itself. On the contrary, we intended to ask what Parisians might not think of our own city, and to query whether there is not a possibility that in the matter of downright vileness they may not insist upon stripping their own city of the palm and conceding it to ours. About all the demoralization of the French capital there is a splendor and glitter which goes far to rob it of its more repulsive features. The pill at least is a gilded one. But about the vice of our own city there is a boldness of brutality, an entire absence of æsthetics and a wantonness of shame which, to the foreigner, might well make the reality of its existence a matter of doubt. Setting aside the Chinese pest that has so long been permitted—an anomaly in the heart of civilization which strangers will only believe upon seeing—the records of our Police Court furnish pictures which, however little they seem to surprise natives, certainly cannot be contemplated by foreigners without astonishment. Scarcely a day passes that the local columns of our daily press do not narrate the particulars of some crime almost too revolting for belief. Now it is a case of incest, again it is the compulsion of a white child by its own mother to submit to the lecherous embraces of a negro, outrages upon children, in fact, forming the staple of Police Court news. And so familiar have our public become with these outrages that they are read without horror and digested without disgust. At the breakfast-table the father of the family picks up his paper and between mouthfulls of muffin, swallows an account of a girl, the age perhaps of his youngest daughter, having been infected with an unmeutionable disease, and the arrest of some man in consequence upon a charge of assault. Very likely the paragraph which chronicles the occurrence has some humorous heading, suggestive of the last story that is being retailed in saloons and printed in the columns of journals that never lose an opportuuity of publishing a "good thing," even at the expense of decency. While we wonder at the pictures of the costumes of scenic pieces given in Le Journal Amusant, and contemplate with horror the portraits of Parisian society painted with such lavishness of color by the pens of special correspondents of cis-Atlantic newspapers, is it not possible that such pictures as our city is given of late to sending out in its journals, of these monstrous crimes, may overwhelm the Parisian so unfortunate as to be familiar enough with our language to enable him to spell down the columns, with disgust, and cause him to cry as he shrugs his shoulders above his ears, Que! pays? Quel peuple!

THE INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

IT has been the cherished wish of the literary men of this country and of England, for years, that their peculiar rights as authors might be effectually maintained by the passage of an international copyright law. Although the subject has been discussed and initiative steps have been taken by both governments for the accomplishment of this object for many successive years, the unreasonable prejudices of the mis-representatives of the people have been in the way of perfecting the object desired. Fourteen years ago Charles Sumner presented to the Congress of the United States a petition from the leading authors of this country, among whom were Washington Irving, Fennimore Cooper and William H. Prescott, praying for some responsive action from Government to protect the interests of American and English authors. The prayer of the petition was not answered, and many of those petitioners have died, having sought justice and protection from their country and failed to find it. The very reasonable desires of those men have been more and more fully appreciated by those who lived with them, and these have united again and have tried at the present session to awaken Congress to a sense of their rights. Mr. Sumner, representing more peculiarly than any other the literary interests of the country, has again offered to Congress a petition, among whose subscribers are Robert C. Winthrop, Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Theodore D. Woolsey, John G. Whittier, Frederick Law Olmstead and others—leading writers—and most of the leading publishers of our country.

It is hard to believe that the body of men composing the Congress of the United States, chosen from among the most intelligent citizens of the Republic and supposed to be representatives of the best interests of the country, moral and literary as well as political, would omit to do exact justice to a class of citizens who have prayed again and again and still are not regarded. But that they may cease to be supplicants it is necessary that all good men and true join this grand army of authors, and march in unbroken column against the stronghold of inexplicable prejudices. The present Congress, passing most of its time in impracticable legislation and in demonstrating most unusual legislative inability, would accomplish something which good men could praise, if the prayer of this petition might reach their ears. If they who love the interests of literature will but unite in their efforts, perhaps they may find ultimate cause of congratulation for their union. There can be, throughout the land, no well-founded opposition to a national copyright law. Opposition to it does not come from reasonable, manly, generous souls, and they from whom it emanates should not be recognized as good citizens of the Republic of Letters. They would not yield true men their rights, but would "take the bread, even, from these childrens' mouths."

If the passage of the law be finally procured, much credit will be due to the Round Table; for aside from an able and active advocacy of the measure in their columns, the conductors of that most excellent journal were foremost in preparing the late petition memorializing Congress.

AMUSEMENTS.

MONTE CHRISTO, very handsomely produced and well played, has filled the bill and kept the stage of the Opera House during the week. Last evening, Uncle Tom's Cabin, for the benefit of C. L. Graves, the stage manager, was announced. If Mr. Graves did not put the piece on well, on such an occasion, it would argue very little for his shrewdness. The Silver Cord, a dramatization of Shirley Brooks' novel of that name, by W. A. Kendall of this city, is announced for production on Monday or Tuesday evening, next week. This afternoon and evening Uncle Tom's Cabin.

At the Metropolitan, the week has been one of benefits, Beneux, the efficient stage manager; Miss Hinckley, the charming "Don Guzman;" and Woodhull, the popular "Don Nigodinas," being the benefitted. The entire Buislay troupe leave on the 19th. On Monday evening next, Mr. Alexander, the well known agent, takes his benefit—the occasion being the last night of the Sheep's Foot. A good house for him.

From the East, we learn that Frank Mayo, refusing to play a part assigned him in Leah, has been discharged from the Boston Museum. Louis Aldrich, in the same piece, has made a favorable impression. Chas. R. Thorne, Sr., purposes a trip to England, to take a Loudon theatre, and then a trip to Australia. Of our Sears-Hayne drama of The Irish Mother, the N. Y. Clipper says: "We have discovered, after having read the plot in a San Francisco paper, that it is no other than Atonement, or the Child Stealer, produced in this city by Lucille Western, and claimed as Charles Gaylor's production. The plot is exactly the same."

GENERAL GRANT has been arrested and fined before a Justice of the Peace for fast driving, says the telegraph. Strange! It was never complained that he drove things too fast during the war. The practice of a habit acquired then should be pardoned him in time of peace.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

AFRICA is no longer a terra incognita, for there are few of its forests which have not been threaded by the adventurous foot of exploration. In Livingstone's Expedition to the Zambesi we have an addition to the many books that have been written upon that country. After Du Chaillu's wonderful tales of gorillas and cannibal Fans, the present volume seems somewhat tame, but its hues commend themselves as the sober ones of truth. Six years of travel are recounted, the journey, as the title indicates, covering a visit to the Zambesi and its tributaries, and the discovery of the Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. Some very interesting facts connected with the slave-trade are told in the progress of the story.

The reign of Henry V., King of England, Lord of Ireland and King of France, was, in many respects, a remarkable one, and a history of that reign, by George Makepeace Towle, is correspondingly interesting. From the life of Henry many military commanders of the present age might well learn a lesson, for he was humane and civilized in the conduct of war; success failed to intoxicate him, and he accepted defeat with serene equanimity. As a chevalier he was without fear, and, as a king, he was well nigh without reproach.

The works of George Sand are too well known to require critical comment. Jealousy is a less powerful novel than either Consuelo or Indiana, but it is stamped throughout as the work of the same hand. The influence of Mme. Dudevant's works we do not now propose to discuss, but they have provoked most voluminous criticism, and even her most constant readers are by no means her very ardent defenders. She herself complains that her critics have mistaken "bladders for lanterns, that is, passions for reasoning, eloquent laments for systems, and the cries of the heart for conclusions." A brief and interesting biography of Mme. Dudevant prefaces the work.

Carlyle's History of Frederick the Great has completion in the sixth volume, fresh from the reproductive presses of the Harpers. Reading Carlyle always reminds us much of riding a bucking horse—after you think you have got accustomed to his gait, he suddenly stops stiff legged and you find yourself landed on his neck if not beyond his ears. So spasmodic are some of his sentences that they always suggest machinery that needs greasing, to prevent its running by jerks. The wealth of thought that underlies all, and the wonderful suggestiveness with which every line of this great advocate of the Unpolished abounds, reconciles one in great measure to his outré style, but still, walking over ploughed ground is sometimes vexatious when one is in a hurry to get on, no matter how rich the soil may be. The picture of the king's last moments is graphic and confused, exhibiting at once the historian at his worst and his best. Following is the summing up of his idea of King Frederick:

"I define him to myself as hitherto the Last of Kings;—when the Next will be, is a very long question! But it seems to me as if Nations, probably all Nations, by and by, in their despair—blinded, swallowed like Jonah, in such a whale's-belly of things brutish, waste, abominable (for is it not Anarchy, or the Rule of what is Baser over what is Nobler, the one life's-misery worth complaining of, and, in fact, the abomination of abominations, springing from and producing all others whatsoever?) as if the Nations universally, and England too if it hold on, may more and more bethink themselves of such a Man and his Function and Performance, with feelings far other than are possible at present. Meanwhile, all I had to say of him is finished: that too, it seems, was a bit of work appointed to be done. Adieu, good readers; bad also, adieu.

A MEMBER of the Wharton street Methodist Church, says a Philadelphia exchange, "rose in his seat last Sunday morning, and said that in a dream on the previous night he had seen the debts of the church entirely discharged, and he believed that the dream would that day be fulfilled. Collections were taken up. The result was that by the contributions of that morning and evening the sum of $6,552 was raised—more than enough to give the church a receipt in full for their entire liabilities." This is indeed dreaming to some purpose, and it is gratifying to know that the "change" which came over the spirit of the vision was of that peculiarly gratifying kind to which no well bred contribution-box ever objects. A friend, who is troubled by duns, has already filed his intention of dreaming some night that his debts are paid—simply to see what the result will be.

FACILITIES are now offered for those who wish to change their names, which were never offered before. We do not now allude to lady citizens, for they have always had a remedy at hand—provided "Barkis" was "willin'". But by a law of the last Legislature, candidates for a change have but to file a petition in the County Court, showing the why and wherefore, pay a small fee, and the thing is done. Apropos of this dispensation is the arrival, by a late steamer, of a gentleman named "Sheepshanks." His acquaintances might have joked him, had it not been for the beneficial act of the Legislature, about coming out here to look after the Sheep's Foot, but now he can place himself beyond the reach of the cloud of small wits in a very few days.

HISTORICAL CONTRADICTIONS are not to be wondered at when the conflicting character of the records upon which History is built are considered. Of this we had an eminent illlustration in the morning journals of yesterday. A man was found floundering in the water at the foot of Washington street, and rescued, his watch, pocket-book, etc., missing—on this fact all agree. The Alta heads its item "Mysterious Affair," and "narrates" how the man, after attending a concert at Platt's Hall, took a drink at the corner of Clay and Montgomery with a friend, walked down Montgomery street to the corner of Washington, and beyond that has no recollection whatever until he found himself in the bay. The Flag heads its item "Robbed," and says: "he went on a little spree with some friends or pretended friends at least, he became intoxicated, and the last knowledge he has of himself was his leaving a saloon on the corner of Clay and Montgomery." But it was reserved for the Call to do the sensational with "A Bold and Successful Robbery," telling with the utmost minuteness how the victim was approached at a quarter past ten by two men, on the corner of Washington and Montgomery streets, who clapped chloroform over his mouth and him into a carriage, drove rapidly down to the wharf, and after despoiling the victim of his personal property, threw him into the water. All this, it says, "was done within a half a block of the headquarters of the Police, within less than a block of two theatres which were in full blast, within sixty feet of the Bank Exchange and four other saloons, all of which were open; within two rods of several persons selling apples and candies on the street, and, singular as it may appear, did not attract the attention of any one." "Singular as it may appear" indeed! Oh Call, Call! is it worth while to sacrifice the reputation of our city in that style, when a much simpler and more rational explanation of the affair suggests itself?

THE Springfield Republican says: "There is no so conspicuous American weakness, natural enough, however, as sensitiveness to English criticism; eagerness to know what our old brothers say of us and our doings, and anger if they don't say the sweet words our conceit thinks we have earned. The London Athenæum gives cordial greeting to Mr. T. B. Aldrich's new volume of poems, thus: 'It is some years since we have met with an American poet so rich in achievement and promise. We do not, as yet, find in him the sustained moral beauty of Longfellow; but he has, without imitation, as much force and minuteness of description as his predecessor, and almost as much music. The author of this volume is an addition to that small band of American poets which is so slowly reinforced.' Of Outcroppings, or Specimens of California Verse, the same journal says: 'Judging from the evidence here offered, it can scarcely be said that California has produced a remarkable poet. Though some of the lays before us have a good deal of sweetness and fancy, they belong, without exception, to minor minstrelsy.' And then it quotes as most worthy, perhaps, Mr. C. H. Webb's "The Going of My Bride.'"

GIRARD'S SECRET.—Stephen Girard, than whom no shrewder business man ever lived, used to say in his old age: "I have always considered advertising liberally and long to be the great medium of success in business, and the prelude to wealth. And I have made it an invariable rule, too, to advertise in the dullest of times as well as the busiest, long experience having taught me that money thus spent is well laid out; as, by keeping my business continually before the public, it has secured me many sales that I would otherwise have lost."

GOTTSCHALK writes from Chili to Paris this memorandum on his sudden departure from Frisco: "I had organized a farewell concert in San Francisco, at which I expected to execute my last symphony and a march for ten pianos and orchestra, when I was obliged to leave the city precipitately, from fear of being assassinated. I will, perhaps, relate to you in my next letter this singular story, which so well paints the customs of the modern El Dorado."

THE country papers have all learned that ex-Collector James left for the East on the Golden City. Lest visitors to our city may think it is his gigantic ghost that still perambulates the streets, we will explain that he was detained by the illness of his son, but will probably leave on the steamer of the 19th inst.

IN its column of "literary gossip," the Bulletin informs us that a handsome edition of Freneau's Poems Relating to the American Revolution, edited by Evert A. Duyckinck, will soon be published in New York city. As the volume was published and in this market two or three steamers ago, we cannot compliment our contemporary on the freshness of its news.

THE public will learn with regret that the popular actress, Mrs. Judah, met with an accident at Grass Valley lately, which prevented her from appearing at the theatre on the evening of the 5th. While returning from rehearsal, she sprained her ankle by a mis-step, the result being to confine her to her room. The public were losers by the lady's misfortune.

CULTIVATION OF FLOWERS.

THE DAHLIA.

THERE are but few plants which have excited the attention among florists that the Dahlia has. Its tenacity of life, the facility with which its various kinds are raised, the diversity of form and color, the great rapidity and certainty with which all or any particular variety may be increased by the division of the stems and roots, its comparative indifference to soil, make it the plant for the people. The first intimation which we have of the introduction of the Dahlia in England is from Spain in 1789, by the Marchioness of Bute, but it is supposed to have been soon afterwards lost. In 1814, there is an authentic account of Dahlia roots having been imported into England, having previous to that period been successfully cultivated in the Royal Gardens in Spain, France and Germany, from whence several varieties found their way into England.

Long before this time—indeed, so early as 1804—we are informed that Lady Holland transmitted seeds of this plant from the Royal Gardens of Madrid to Mr. Buonaiuti, then residing in England.

The native country of the Dahlia is Mexico, where it was first discovered by Humboldt, about 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. The name Dahlia was first given to this genus in honor of Dahl, a Swedish botanist. It has already attained great beauty and regularity of form and color, but there remains much yet to be accomplished, and its cultivators should not rest satisfied until they rival those exquisitely beautiful colors so remarkable in the Tulip and Carnation. M. de Candolle, in his essay on the genus, states that there is no probability of ever producing a blue Dahlia, since the variation of color is from purple to yellow, and, therefore, as he considers blue and yellow to be the fundamental types of the colors of flowers, one naturally excludes the other: yellows pass readily into red or white, but never into blue. In like manner, blue flowers pass into red and white, but never into yellow. To grow the Dahlia with success, it is first necessary that the situation should be sheltered; unless this be the case, the lateral branches, on which the flowers are produced, will always be more or less injured and broken by the wind, and no staking, however carefully performed, will effectually overcome this difficulty. The soil in which they are planted should be loose, and made rich by the addition of well rotted or old stable manure. When fairly started growing, they should have plenty of water, and, if a mulch, or covering of leaves or straw or grass, is placed on the earth above the roots, it will prevent the rapid evaporation. In planting the ground should be thoroughly loosened, and the manure well worked in; then place the stake (to which they are to be tied for support) in the hole, putting the plant or root alongside; this prevents breaking the roots, which after-staking is apt to do. To those who have a Dahlia root, and wish to increase the number, the best way is to place it in a warm place to start, and then with a knife carefully separate the shoots, and each one will form a handsome plant.

As the plants increase in size and reach the flowering period, they require an increased amount of water; as soon as the buds form, select the finest on the ends of the shoots for blooming, taking off those from the sides, in this way the flowers will be much finer, and remain in bloom for a longer period. Those who wish some particularly fine blooms, can improve them greatly by shading them from the sun, placing a small screen or cap over each bloom, supported by a stake. This allows the flower to open gradually and develop all its beauties, and those who have not seen it treated in this way, would scarcely recognize it as the common dahlia. At some of the exhibitions of the Royal Horticultural Society of England, blooms were shown surpassingly beautiful in form and color, produced in this way. There are but few plants which have received the care and attention towards improvement that has been bestowed upon the dahlia; and for city and suburban gardens it has no superior where quantities of flowers are desired.

Some of the new varieties lately produced by hybridizing are exquisitely beautiful, the size of the flowers being no larger than the daisy, and as perfect in form and color as the larger varieties.

If some of the plant lovers who read this article could visit any of the amateur or professional dahlia-growers' grounds about England, they would certainly say there are no flowers equal to it. The great length of time they are in bloom, and the ease with which they are grown, entitle them to a prominent place in our gardens.

TO FARMERS, MINERS, LABORERS

And all those wishing to secure themselves a portion of

THE MOST VALUABLE AGRICULTURAL AND MINERAL LANDS OF MEXICO,

With an equal interest in the Profits of the Plantations of

THE MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON COMPANY.

HOMES FOR THE POOR AND COMPETENCY FOR ALL.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having reserved from their final Subscription List a Limited Number of Unassessable Shares, (the remaining shares of the Company having been taken up by the stockholders,) hereby offer the same for sale at the original subscription price of Sixteen Dollars each, payable in cash. Every holder of a share will be entitled to a portion of the Company's lands, having the privilege to settle thereon and participate in all the advantages and profits of the enterprise, and special privileges granted to this Company by an Imperial Decree of Maximilian, dated 9th January, 1866, without being subjected to the conditions of regular Government emigrants, this Company settling upon their own lands, secured by private purchase, and held under indisputable Spanish titles.

Shareholders becoming actual settlers will also have the privilege of any employment upon the Company's plantation. Portions of land will be allotted to settlers, to be held by them until a final division makes it their property.

For the purpose of increasing the value of the Company's land, and to create all the comforts of a home and society, it is the intention of the company to form a regular settlement and to lay out a town adjoining their present plantation into building lots, which will likewise be fairly divided between the 8,000 shares which comprise the total number of the company.

A large number of shareholders will settle upon the company's lands after the rainy season in October next. Many of them may then be employed by the company, or by others able to plant for themselves, or in developing the mineral resources of the adjoining mountains, etc., etc.

Men of all trades and professions, desiring to emigrate to Mexico, will have great advantages as shareholders of this company. They will find the lands already purchased for them at a rate equivalent to a free gift, to be held by each shareholder as his property, protected by the best Spanish titles, and the good will of all political parties now contending for the reins of government; the climate the most salubrious, and the land rich and fertile beyond description; every kind of game abounding; the rivers full of fish and with extensive beds of large oysters; altogether, a country where it is easy to procure a livelihood and the comforts of a home with less labor and less capital than in any other part of the world.

The extensive placer diggings, veins of silver, and solid quartz ledges, which are to be found in the immediate vicinity, and acknowledged to be rich and very extensive, can, by the presence of a number of settlers, be profitably developed. Many of these mines are to be found within the limits of the company's grant. The Sierra Madre or Mother Mountain of Mexico, situated only within about twenty miles from the coast, can be reached and developed with much greater facility than the more remote mines in the interior, and will therefore make the company's lands the most desirable to locate upon.

For Maps and Survey, and further information, apply at the office of the MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON CO., Betge's Book Store, Russ House, Montgomery street, between the hours of 11 and 1 o'clock.

☞ All the assessable stock having been taken up by mutual subscription of stockholders, the company will have no more shares to offer after the limited number of unassessable shares have been placed, and shall prefer to sell these to actual settlers—a single share of which will be sufficient to entitle them to a large portion of the lands.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED shareholders in the Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having investigated and satisfied ourselves of the importance of the enterprise, recommend the same to the public. We are convinced that under the management of the present officers of the company, with their efforts to induce industrious parties to locate upon the land, that the enterprise must become very profitable to all parties interested, and most beneficial to actual settlers.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby prodneing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important considerationparticularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived by thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

M. Howard's Hair Restorative,

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but,

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION, we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

LOOSE LEAVES FROM A YOUNG LADY'S JOURNAL.

[To the Editor of The Californian—Dear Sir: As I was walking throngh a garden the other day, I found scattered-about pages which seemed extracts from a yonng lady's diary. I take the liberty to send them to you, entitled "Loose Leaves from a Yonng Lady's Journal." Respectfully, DENNAR STEUART.]

NUMBER TWO.

MAY 8TH, 1862.

And so I have neglected you a whole week, and that the first in our cottage. I say "our" not that I have possessions, landed, funded, or otherwise. I am not so rich even as "Mary with her little lamb," of "First Reader" memory. My "onr" is a merely nominal partnership in the goods and chattels of my frieads, a pleasant figment—a "play" property-holding, as Clara would term it. And as I deceive no one, not even you, trusty Journal, what harm in my assnming the pronoun possessive? I am staying with a friend, a female friend, and I too am a female. My friend's husband is in the army, and there, too, for anything I know, is mine. As the neighbors say, "I make my home with Mrs. Norwood for the present." But the neighbors are wrong in one thing. 'Tis Sarah, bless her dear heart, that makes my home with her.

Being "made at home" is the most disagreeable process one can undergo as conducted by some people. Their "Don't stand npon ceremony" means just this, no standing place at all, and "Feel perfectly at liberty," is, in plain English, freedom in nothing—while, "We treat you as one of the family" leads yon to revert with peculiar fervor in your petition "for all men" to the unfortunate permanents in the domestic circle which temporarily adopts you. Sarah is the antipodes of these people, and you know, Journal, that I am not one of that terrible tribe who make endless visits. Mine is a positive engagement until September only. Where I shall find local habitation after that time I know not. "Poor Joe" doubtless "moved on" and so, likely, shall I.

Charley has been here at school for a year or two, and this brings his mother to this locality for the hot season. Clara, and little Ben. Russell—about her own age—compose our family. This cottage is sitnated in one of these Jonah's Gourd villages which springs np in a day from the faintest promise of a railroad. The railroad came, but a mile or two west, and there is the town—of which this is a border adjunct, a compromise between town and conntry, whose distingnishing glory is "The Young Gentlemen's Institute," over which Dr. Cadmus presides.

JUNE 12TH.

WE have a fine orchard, nice garden, and two respectable cows, attached to this cottage, with troops of contrahands in the vicinity, from whom to procure assistance. Yet, with all these advantages, we daily scold at Miss Muloch for the bewitching advice which led us to set up "Ladies' Hall," with the anticipation of being happy as Eve in Eden. Ah! most convincing Dinah, it has already occurred to ns that Eve's gardener went before her, and wisely enough.

"Such boys! Did you ever see the like?" sighed Sarah over her coffee-cup, yesterday morning.

"They bear no great external resemblance to the trim lads with pointed jackets, bright buttons and tasteful caps," I replied.

"And they're as dissimilar in disposition, Nettie, as a bear and a kitten, a crocodile and a canary bird."

"And then such names, Sarah. One might punish a common Tom, Dick or Harry, provided he were caught; but when Wesley, Clarkson, Kossuth, and Horace Greeley are the offenders, what can poor hero-worshipping women do?"

"Oh, nothing, but to let the little scape-graces go on—filching grapes, picking currants, eating strawberries, and plundering peach trees, the summer through, unwhipped 'by Justice or any other critter,' as Father Harris would say. Suppose we reckon up our chief annoyances. It will really relieve me to set our grievances in array."

"I think we will be puzzled where to award precedence; but I'll venture to head the list, contrahands and cows, and yon may state the merits of the case."

"In the first place, it is ascertained beyond doubt that the African intellect cannot comprehend the capacities and requirements of the bovine stomach. They subject the kine to an alternate rule of Feast and Famine."

"Really, yon are becoming quite a farmer, Sarah."

"Had I been a slave-holder, I should have become as crazy as the South Carolinians, if our domestic establishment is a fair sample of the 'peculiar institution.'"

"You surely won't include Annt Winnie and Clay in this sweeping denunciation."

"No, Aunt Winnie is an ebony angel. She says she's 'an old nigger who ain't got much sense—only nuff to be kind, it 'pears like.' And Clay is quite a treasure. You have observed his tender, passionate fondness for roses. This morning I gave him some, and, as soon as he thought himself beyond my sight, he went along smiling upon them in an inexpressibly caressing and affectionate manner."

"Clay's jest made wid dem roses, mistus," remarked Aunt Winnie. "He's done got the last in a teacup yet. He nusses 'em ever so long, and calls 'em his dear mother."

"Why, what does he mean?"

"Don' 'no, mistus, he's thoughted like. I reckon it's something he's rode in de little book Miss Nett teached him. Specs he seed dear mother dar."

"Clay, you know, is one of Aunt Winnie's three adopted boys, her 'fellow servants' in a sugar plantation in Alabama. She says he was brought from Missouri to their place, three years ago, when about seven years old. His mother was left. Aunt Winnie has never seen her."

When my little rose-fancier returned, I quietly asked: "Did you have roses in Alabama, Clay?"

"No, Missis."

"Did you have them in Missouri?"

"O yes, Missis."

"And did your mother give them to you there?"

"Yes, Missis."

"And so you call them 'dear mother' to remember her by, do you?"

"That's it, Missis," with a surprised look as if I were a witch or diviner. Isn't that a beautiful regard, even in a black boy, to so cherish the memory of his mother—in a rose?

Sarah's grievances were not wholly reached when I dropped my pen for another implement yesterday. You must hear them out, Journal, mine.

"Now put down my garden experience—although any hope of a vegetable is blighted now, yet you know what a host of little worries it has been—which, fly-like, are much in the many, though nothing in the one. You know what a Diogenia I was, exploring the whole country for a man to plough and plant it?"

"Yes; and I know what came next. No sooner were the seeds fairly up than a deputation of peripatetic hogs entered and held high carnival."

"Yes; I really think the devil who entered the swine still remains in the animal of his selection. And then add that the calf followed the swine, laying out the beds in every direction, and that after him came the chickens—"

"Look, Sarah, isn't that Bennie's father at the gate?"

"Why do you never call him Mr. Russell?"

And no sooner was the gentleman fairly within than "Cousin Fred, Nettie thinks you dependent upon Bennie for a name. She invariably terms you Bennie's father."

"I can exchange the compliment with Miss Stephens. She is known throughout the neighborhood as 'Mrs. Norwood's friend.' But I must win a name for myself or be content with the paternal apellation, I see. Have you become acquainted in the vicinity, Mrs. Norwood?"

"But slightly. Few visitors have, as yet, honored our arrival, and we have returned only part of these calls, a ceremony I quite dread with strangers. I am no adept in current conventionalities, and, ignorant of all the personalities of the new acquaintance, feel upon unknown ground."

"Perhaps we can steal a peep at two or three of our neighbors through Mr. Russell, Sarah."

"Yes; that will be an admirable arrangement. Now, Mr. Russell, turn artist, like the good cousin you are, and give us side-views, full-lengths or outlines at your discretion. You're an old resident, I, a stranger; it's simply right that you should be cicerone among tenements human."

"But there are different ways of looking at persons, and yon should use your own optical apparatus. I may give you unjust pictures, caricatures, possibly; for, as Charles Lamb says of himself: 'I am a very bundle of prejudices, and cannot like all people alike.'"

"We'll judge of your fidelity when we know the subjects of your sketches ourselves. Commence with Mrs. Hall, who called this morning, if yon please. Mrs. Hall, of Hill-top, I think I heard her place called."

"I cannot portray her, cousin Sarah, if I would, and can but feebly describe to you how she impresses me. I have sometimes observed, in passing along a crowded thoroughfare, grave-stones thrust upon the very pavement, leaning against and around the marble-cutter's shop. I have paused and read the inscription, 'Sacred to the memory of A—— R——,' one, perhaps, who died ten, fifteen or twenty years agone. The effect is startling, spectral. What have these recorded on the white marble to do with the busy throbbing street, the eager anxious crowd who press and jostle by? Away with them to their places. To the city of the Dead, not that of the living. On some green grave they shall seem fittingly placed. Here they are cold, unwelcome intruders. Just such an influence emanates from this forbidding woman. Even her virtues you like the less, because they are her's. I take her passive hand with an inward shudder. I speak to her of the events of the day, the little interests of our circle and village, just as you would say to that tomb-stone whose foot rests upon the pavement, 'Come, Betsey Jane, beloved daughter of such an one, let us go to Madam Greehy's and see her spring opening, or to Pierson's for one of his beautiful new silks.' 'I did thus and so in my life-time,' said an insane man, whom I used to know, when referring to events which occurred previous to his mental aberration. I sometimes think if Mrs. Hall ever felt warmly and vividly, 'twas in some by-gone 'life-time,' like Uncle Richards."

"She is wealthy and a widow, is she not?" queried Sarah.

"Yes; her husband died many years since. I think his name who dared to wed that Polar dignity should be placed among those bold adventurers into arctic seas, who feared not icebergs for companions. I am convinced their fate was identical—frozen."

"Warmer colors in the next sketch, Mr. Russell, I beseech you. My teeth begin to 'chatter, chatter,' like those of poor Harry Gill."

"Draw us that dear Major Steinberg across the way, cousin Fred. We're half in love with him already and his charming old Frau. Aren't they a model Joe Anderson and Tibbie, if, indeed, that was the name of Mrs. My Joe John?"

"I'll label the outline, 'Hints according to Mrs. Norwood.' Years have imparted dignity to the old soldier without adding infirmity. The manly figure is still erect, the smile warm and the manner cordial and vigorous. It is evident that the veteran of Waterloo still bears a glowing young heart. The white hair and beard lend an imposing venerableness of aspect, while they do not detract from the almost juvenile sympathy and enthusiasm of the man. He is like a tall and thrifty evergreen on which the snow has fallen lightly. Time has called at his earthly tabernacle again and again, but the owner never was within. He was away with birds and flowers; on the grass watching the butterflies, or scenting fresh breezes from a neighboring hill. And so, though the hair is bleached and the cheek furrowed, the gay, good heart remains untouched. Old Time cannot lay a finger upon it."

"Life like, graphic. Now, Sir Crayon, for the gentleman above; a secessionist, I hear."

"O no, a patriot; one to whom each feather in our bird of freedom is a matter of vital interest. He counts the plumelets o'er and o'er, thinking where he can safest pluck for that eagle's-down bed of his. And the Goddess of Liberty he fairly adores, especially when wearing the dress with a pocket. His motto is that of the Woodstock man:

> 'Of all my father's children
> I love myself the best,
> And so the Lord provides for me,
> The devil may take the rest.'

He must be allowed to pass with this profile."

"But his melancholy niece, Miss Irene, with her sweet brown eyes, that always seem to me shadowed by unseen tears. And I fancy her soft musical voice is but the echo of a sigh unheard."

"The Painter can hardly rival the Poet, Miss Nettie. Your sentence holds my entire picture. I will represent her as floating down the River of Life, ever gazing backward, her eyes fixed upon one object, which is within sight, but beyond reach. It is a corpse pallid and pure as marble. Decay and corruption breathe not on the still face so marvellously beautiful. The damp locks have not lost their sunny curl, and the red lips are still blossoming into kisses. The white hands reach towards Irene with entreating clasp; each dainty chiseled finger, in mute gesture, bids her not forget. This body cannot be buried; it cannot sink. Slowly, distinctly, it drifts after her, yet far behind. With longing fondness she ever looks backward and weeps, for this immortal dead is the lovely Past."

"But there comes Sam with my horse and the paper. Can you believe, ladies, that such a carpet-knight as I have just proved myself, really takes an interest in 'Latest Despatches from the Seat of War?'"

"How differently we are situated from our Revolutionary ancestors," I remarked. "Intelligence reached them so slowly, while, thanks to the telegraph, we hear the same day from a distant battle-field just what—"

"Isn't going on there," interposed the practical Sarah.

Mr. Russell smiled as he took his hat and gloves. "My cousin is still the 'Auld Lang Syne' Sallie, Miss Stephens. She would always sacrifice Imagination to Truth, and is a very Gradgrind, in her handling of Fancy, an embodied ejaculation of 'Facts, Facts' to all such dreamers as you and I."

A LONDON paper truly says: "It is curious that the most questionable novels of the day should be written by women. To judge from their books, the ideas of women on points of morals and ethics seem in a state of transition, and consequently, of confusion. With the heroes and heroines of women's stories 'circumstances alter cases,' until it would seem impossible to obtain an absolute rule of life and conduct. As regards the heroines, who have to utter the choice thoughts and do all the best actions of the tale, and to set forth their author's ideas of excellence, they are generally lax in the performance of obvious duties and exaggerated in the observance of superfluous obligations; they generally contrive to do wrong from having entangled themselves in some knot of difficulty, which they will not unite, though they alone know the easy secret."

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medieal and Surgieal Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may exeite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effeet of such a eause. We are personally aequainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under ehronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, hut without suceess, until they ealled upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short spaee of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to annonnee this fact, heeause the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not hy defamation of others, to estahlish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor eonducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without eharge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, ean accept or rejeet at pleasure. In no ease does the Doctor make a charge unless he effeets a eure. This he is ahle to do, hecause he feels the confidence whieh long experienee has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either aeute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it ean do no harm, as for consultatiou he asks uo fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the putieut places himself under his care. RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this eoast a great deal of suffering is experieneed from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protrueted and aggravated misery is endured hy the vietims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, whieh eould he cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given helow, and is only the echo of hundreds of other eases. Dr. Bourne eures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonie Temple, Post street eutrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I wus neurly dead, hy an attack of inflummatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking ahout the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a earriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was hy them lifted into the hath, yet, on eoming out of the bath I was ahle to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the hath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my earriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all paiu and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. Aud now I am happy to do this little serviee of puhlicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my frieuds and aequaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend, JOSEPH SPARROW.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human raee spring from causes so small as to almost defy deteetion. The volumes of scientifie lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medieal fraternity only go to prove and elahorate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indieator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the hody, but it will reueh the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death he the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills eure where all others fail. THE Best Blood Purifier Known.

Persons that are troubled with Rheumatism, Scrofula, Neuralgia, Morbid Liver, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Boils, or any of the many diseases that originate from Impure Blood, would find it much to their advantage to give this justly celebrated article a trial. One or two bottles are quite sufficient to convince the most skeptical of its merits. It contains neither Spirit, ARSENIC nor MERCURY which cannot be truly said of any other preparation called "Sarsaparilla."

A Sure Cure

FOR COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS

DYSPEPSIA,

CONSUMPTION,

NIGHT SWEATS, AND PULMONARY

DISEASES.

Read the following:

REMARKABLE CURE.

San Francisco, September 5th, 1865

I desire to make known the fact that I was afflicted with a very bad cough for fifteen years, and, during this time, used everything which I could hear of without getting the better of my disease, until I tried Dr. D. B. Vincent's Cold Preventative or Cough Mixture, which cured me sound and well.

NEWTON MOORE.

This is to certify that my wife has been troubled with indigestion for nearly eighteen months, and, by using one bottle of Dr. Vincent's medicine, has been completely cured.

San Francisco, April 6th, 1866.

JOHNSON J. THOMAS.

San Francisco, July 17th, 1865.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much better; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

JOHN O'NEILL, National Hotel.

The above named diseases nearly all originate from the same or similar causes, and will cure all of them. It is a sure cure for Dyspepsia. Price, 50 cents per bottle.

THE COLD PREVENTIVE

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S
Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, tha Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,

HEART QUESTIONS.

THIS life seems a life in the dark at best,
A problem unsolved, a riddle unguessed—
Ah! has it some secret of love?
This blundering tangle of hopes and fears,
This striving for smiles, this hiding of tears,
This muffling of sighs through slow-draggiug years;
Say, has it some solace above?

Oh, is there some land where they see in light
The bane and blessing, the wrong and the right?
Where Love is not twin to Sorrow?
Where warm-throbbing hearts are all understood?
Where they trust each other, the pure and good?
Where Truth is ne'er hidden in Error's hood?
And Right waits not for To-Morrow?

Some beautiful clime where the strife shall cease,
Whose air blows sweet with the lilies of peace?
Whose sun is unshaded by night?
Where words can never play false to the thought?
Where Good entwines not with Evil unsought?
And sorrows of earth with gladness are fraught
In a land where they know aright?

A home where they live whom we here call "dead?"
Where a crown encircles the bright young head
Which, for God and the Fatherland,
Laid lowly down in the Wilderness grim,
To a nameless grave 'mid the forests dim;
When Angels are chanting the morning hymn
Will he reach out the greeting hand?

DENNAR STEUART.

"MARK TWAIN" AT SEA.

THE "OLD NOR'WEST SWELL."

ON the Sunday following our departure we had a fine day. and no wind scarcely, yet the sea ran high and the ship rolled a good deal. Upon inquiry, I learned that this was caused by the "old nor'west swell," which resembles any Broadway "swell" in that it puts on a good many airs and conducts itself pretentiously even when it is not able to "raise the wind." The old nor'west swell, produced by the prevailing wind from that quarter, is always present in these seas, ever drifting on its eternal journey across the waters of the Pacific, year after year, and century after century as well, no doubt, and piling its billows aloft careless whether it be storm or calm. The wind and the swell both die out just above the equator. Another wind and another swell come up around Cape Horn from the opposite direction, and these die out just below the equator—so that a windless, waveless belt is left at the centre of the earth, which marks the equator as distinctly as does the little black line on the map. Ships drifts idly on that glassy sea, under the flaming sun of the tropics, for weeks together, without a breath of wind to flutter the drooping sails or fan the sweltering and blasphemous sailors.

PASSING AWAY THE WEARY TIME.

In writing about sea voyages it is customary to state, with the blandest air of conveying information of rare freshness and originality, that anything, however trivial, that promises to spice the weary monotony of the voyage with a new sensation, is eagerly seized upon and the most made of it by the passengers. I decline to insult your intelligence by making this threadbare statement, preferring to believe you would easily divine the existence of the fact without having to be told it.

We had a bullock tied up on the forecastle, and a box near by with two sheep and a pig in it. These animals afforded a trifling amusement for us on our fair days, and when the opportunity offered we used to go forward and worry them. The bullock was always down on his beam-ends. If he ever dared to get up on his feet for a second in stormy weather, the next lurch of the ship would "snatch him bald-headed," as Mr. Brown expressed it, and flop him flat on the deck; and in fair weather he was seldom able to get up, on account of his sore bones, acquired through the bangs and bruises of his foul weather experiences. So the bullock lay down pretty much all the time from San Francisco to Honolulu—and ever as his wandering gaze rested upon reeling men, and plunging ship and towering billow, his eloquent eye damned the weather.

Said Mr. Brown, once: "Let's go forward and twist the Captain's tail."

"Who? Captain Godfrey?"

"Thunder! no; Captain Gordon."

"Who?"

"Why, the bullock—Captain Gordon. We call him Captain Gordon because he lays down so much."

I recognized the point of Mr. Brown's facetiousness then. Captain Gordon, a not undistinguished officer of the Eastern armies, had kept his room all the way, but as he was unwell enough to prefer that course to staggering about the tossing decks, and had a right to do as he pleased anyhow, I reprimanded Brown on the spot for his inconsiderate levity.

The pig was pulled and hauled and cuffed for the amusement of the idle passengers, but unknown to himself he had his revenge; for he imparted such a villainous odor of the sty to the hands and clothing of any man who meddled with him, that that man could never drift to windward of a lady passenger without suffering disgrace and humiliation under the rebuke of her offended upturned nose. The pig had no name. This was a source of ceaseless regret to Mr. Brown, and he often spoke of it. At last one of the sailors named it, and Brown happened to be passing by and overhead him. The sailor was feeding the animals, and the pig kept crowding the sheep away and monopolizing the slop pail. The sailor rapped him on the nose and said:

"Oh, go way wid you, Dinnis."

To have heard the passengers go into explosions of laughter when Brown rushed in, in a state of wild excitement, and related this circumstance, one might have supposed that this ship had been sailing round and round the world for dreary ages, and that this was the first funny circumstance that had ever blessed with a gleam of cheerfulness the dismal voyage. But, as other writers have said before, even so diluted a thing as this can send a thrill of delight through minds and bodies growing torpid under the dull sameness of a long sea voyage.

From that day forward it was Dennis here, and Dennis there, and Dennis everywhere. Dennis was in everybody's mouth; Dennis was mentioned twice where the everlasting wonder, "how many miles we made yesterday," was expressed once. A stranger's curiosity would have been excited to the last degree to know who this rival to General Grant in notoriety was, that had so suddenly sprung up—this so thoroughly canvassed, discussed, and popular "Dennis." But on the 16th of March Dennis was secretly executed by order of the steward, and Brown said that when the fact became generally known, there was not a dry eye in the ship. He fully believed what he said, too. He has a generous heart and a fervent imagination, and a capacity for creating impossible facts and then implicitly believing them himself, which is perfectly marvellous.

Dennis was served up on the 17th for our St. Patrick's dinner, and gave me a stomach-ache that lasted twenty-four hours. In life he was lovely, and behold, he was powerful in death. Peace to his ashes!—"Mark Twain," in the Sacramento Union.

A NEW VOLCANIC ISLAND.

THE Athens correspondent of the London Times furnishes the subjoined description of a new Greek island: "A new island began to rise above the level of the sea in the Bay of Thera (Santorin) on the 4th of February, and in five days it attained the height of from 130 to 150 feet, with a length of upwards of 350 feet, and a breadth of 100 feet. It continues to increase, and consists of a rusty black metallic lava, very heavy and resembling half-smelted scoria which has boiled up from a furnace. It contains many small whitish semi-transparent particles disseminated through the mass like quartz or feldspar. The shape of Santorin on the map gives an idea of its volcanic formation. It appears to be the eastern half of an immense crater, stretching in a semi-circle round a bay in which the sea now covers the seat of volcanic action. The destruction of the southwestern rim of the crater let in the water. The northwestern portion is the island of Therasia. The bay is about six geographical miles long, and upwards of four broad. Near the centre there are three islands which have risen from the sea during eruptions recorded in history—Palaia, Nea, and Mikre Kaimene, or Old, New, and Little Burnt (Island,) naming them in their order from west to east. The present eruption commenced on the 31st of January. A noise like volleys of artillery was heard, but without any earthquake. On the following day flames issued from the sea, in a part of the bay called Vulkanos, where the water is always discolored and impregnated with sulphur from abundant springs at the bottom. The flames rose at intervals to the height of fifteen feet, and were seen at times to issue from the southwestern part of Nea Kaimene. That island was soon rent by a deep fissure, and the southern part sank considerably.

"On the 4th of February the eruptions became more violent and the sea more disturbed. Gas forced itself up from the depths with terrific noise, resembling the bursting of a steam-boiler; flames arose at intervals, and white smoke, rising steadily, formed an immense column, crowned with a curled capital of dark heavy clouds. The new island was visible next morning, increasing sensibly to the eye as it rose out of the sea at no great distance to the south of Nea Kaimene. The new island has been visited by Dr. Dekigalla, a man of science and an able observer, who will record accurately all the phenomena of the present eruption as it proceeds. The heat of the sea rose from 62 Fabrenheit to 122 as near the vicinity of volcanic action as it was safe to approach. The bottom of the sea all round Nea Kaimene appears to have risen greatly In one place, where the depth is marked on the Admiralty chart one hundred fathoms, it was found to be now only thirty, and at another where it was seventeen, it is now only three fathoms. The new island, as it increases, will probably form a junction with Nea Kaimene. It grows, as it were, out of the sea, the mass below pushing upwards that which is already above water. The lower part is hot, its fissures, where they are deep, being 170 Fahrenheit, and the upper part, after four days' exposure, was found to be still 80.

"At present the centre of the volcanic force lies evidently far below the bottom of the sea, and only gases and smoke work their way through the incumbent earth to the water, and escape in noise, flames, and smoke to the surface. But should a fissure at the bottom of the sea allow the water to penetrate to the fires that throw up the melted metal of the new island to the surface, an eruption may take place of a kind similar to that which destroyed Pompeii, but far more terrible. The eruption that formed the present island of Nea Kaimene began in the year 1707, and the volcanic action continued, without doing any serious injury to the inhabitants of Thera, until 1713. It is possible the present eruption may continue as long, and be as mild in its operation. But as late as 1650 a terrible eruption laid waste a great part of the island, and raised an island on its northeastern coast, which soon sank again into the sea, leaving a shoal. The island of Old Kaimene made its first appearance in the year 198 before the Christian era. Its size was increased by several eruptions mentioned in history."

UNCROWNED KINGS.

OH ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
Made royal by the brain and heart;
Of all Earth's wealth the noblest part.
Yet reckoned nothing in the mart
Where men know naught but sordid things;
All hail to ye, most kingly kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
Whose breath and words of living flame
Have waked slaved nations from their shame,
And bid them rise in manhood's name;
Swift as the curved bow backward springs
To follow ye, most kingly kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
Whose strong right arm hath oft been bared;
Where fires of righteous battles glared:
To think on ye the heart upsprings:
Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
Whose burning songs, like lava poured,
Have smitten like a two-edged sword,
Sent forth by Heaven's avenging Lord
To purge the earth, where serfdom clings
To all but ye, oh kingly kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
To whose ecstatic gaze alone
The beautiful by heaven is shown,
And who have made it all your own;
Your lavish hand around us flings
Earth's richest wreath, oh noble kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
The heart leaps wildly at your thought,
And the brain fires as if it caught
Shreds of your mantle; ye have fought
Not vainly, if your glory brings
A lingering light to earth, oh kings!

Oh ye uncrowned but kingly kings!
Whose souls on Marah's fruit did sup
And went in fiery chariots up,
Where each had drained his hemlock cup:
Ye friends of God, but tyrants' stings,
Uncrowned, but still the kingliest kings!

MRS. BULLWINKLE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

LADIES and gentlemen. Give me five minutes' sympathy and attention. I have something serious to say to you.

I am a married man, with an income which is too miserably limited to be worth mentioning. About a month since, my wife advanced me one step nearer to the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, by presenting me with another child. On five previous occasions, her name had appeared in the List of British Mothers which adorns the daily Supplement of the Times newspaper. At each of these trying periods (I speak entirely of myself when I use the word "trying") she was attended by the same Monthly Nurse. On this last, and sixth, occasion, we were not so fortunate as to secure the services of our regular functionary. She was already engaged; and a new Nurse, with excellent recommendations, was, therefore, employed in her stead. When I first heard of her, and was told that her name was Mrs. Bullwinkle, I laughed. It was then the beginning of the month. It is now the end of it, and I write down that once comical name with a settled gravity which nothing can disturb.

We all know Mrs. Gamp. My late Monthly Nurse is the exact antipodes of her. Mrs. Bullwinkle is tall and dignified; her complexion is fair: her Grecian nose is innocent of all convivial coloring; her figure is not more than agreeably plump; her manners are icily composed; her dress is quiet and neat; her age cannot be more than five-and-thirty; her style of conversation, when she talks, is flowing and grammatical—upon the whole, she appears to be a woman who is much too ladylike for her station in life. When I first met Mrs. Bullwinkle on the stairs, I felt inclined to apologize for my wife's presumption in engaging her services. Though I checked this absurd impulse, I could not resist answering the new nurse's magnificent curtsy by expressing a polite hope that she would find her situation everything that she could wish, under my roof.

"I am not accustomed to exact much, sir," said Mrs. Bullwinkle. "The cook seems, I am rejoiced to say, to be an intelligent and attentive person. I have been giving her some little hints on the subject of my meals. I have ventured to tell her, that I eat little and often; and I think she thoroughly understands me."

I am ashamed to say I was not so sharp as the cook. I did not thoroughly understand Mrs. Bullwinkle, until it became my duty, through my wife's inability to manage our domestic business, to settle the weekly bills. I then became sensible of an alarming increase in our household expenditure. If I had given two dinner-parties in the course of the week, the bills could not have been more exorbitant: the butcher, the baker, and the grocer could not have taken me at a heavier pecuniary disadvantage. My heart sank as I thought of my miserable income. I looked up piteously from the bills to the cook for an explanation.

The cook looked back at me compassionately, shook her head, and said:

"Mrs. Bullwinkle."

I reckoned up additional joints, additional chops, additional steaks, fillets, kidneys, gravy beef. I told off a terrible supplement to the usual family consumption of bread, flour, tea, sugar, and alcoholic liquids. I appealed to the cook again; and again the cook shook her head, and said, "Mrs. Bullwinkle."

My miserable income obliges me to look after sixpences, as other men look after five-pound notes. Ruin sat immovable on the pile of weekly bills, and stared me sternly in the face. I went up into my wife's room. The new nurse was not there. The unhappy partner of my pecuniary embarrassments was reading a novel. My innocent infant was smiling in his sleep. I had taken the bills with me. Ruin followed them up-stairs, and sat spectral on one side of the bed, while I sat on the other.

"Don't be alarmed, love," I said, "if you hear the police in the house. Mrs. Bullwinkle has a large family, and feeds them all out of our provisions. A search shall be instituted, and slumbering Justice shall be aroused. Look at these joints, these chops, these steaks, these fillets, these kidneys, these gravy beefs!"

My wife shook her head, exactly as the cook had shaken hers; and answered precisely as the cook had answered, "Mrs. Bullwinkle."

"But where does she hide it all?" I exclaimed.

My wife shut her eyes, and shuddered.

"John!" she said, "I have privately consulted the doctor; and the doctor says Mrs. Bullwinkle is a Cow."

"If the doctor had to pay these bills," I retorted savagely, "he would not be quite so free with his jokes."

"He is in earnest, dear. He explained to me, what I never knew before, that a Cow is an animal with many stomachs——"

"What!" I cried out, in amazement; "do you mean to tell me that all these joints, these chops, these steaks, these fillets, these kidneys, these gravy beefs—these loaves, these muffins, these mixed biscuits—these teas, these sugars, these brandies, gins, sherries, and beers, have disappeared in one week, down Mrs. Bullwinkle's throat?"

"All, John," said my wife, sinking back on the pillow with a groan.

It was impossible to look at the bills and believe it. I questioned and cross questioned my wife, and still elicited nothing but the one bewildering answer, "All, John." Determined—for I am a man of a logical and judicial mind—to have this extraordinary and alarming case properly investigated, I took out my pocket-book and pencil, and asked my wife if she felt strong enough to make a few private entries for my satisfaction. Finding that she willingly accepted the responsibility, I directed her to take down, from her own personal investigation, a statement of Mrs. Bullwinkle's meals, and of the time at which she partook of each of them, for twenty-four hours, beginning with one morning and ending with another. After making this arrangement, I descended to the parlor, and took the necessary business measures for using the cook as a check upon her mistress. Having carefully instructed her to enter, on the kitchen slate, everything that was sent up to Mrs. Bullwinkle, for twenty-four hours, I felt that my machinery for investigating the truth was now complete. If the statement of the mistress, in bed on the second floor, agreed with the statement of the cook, in the distant sphere of the kitchen, there could then be no doubt that I had obtained a perfectly correct statement on the mysterious subject of Mrs. Bullwinkle's meals.

In due time the two reports were sent in, and I had an opportunity of understanding at last, what "eating little and often" really meant, in the case of my wife's monthly nurse. Except in one particular, to be hereafter adverted to, both statements agreed exactly. Here is the list, accompanied by a correct time-table, of Mrs. Bullwinkle's meals, beginning with the morning of Monday and ending with the morning of Tuesday. I certify on my word of honor, as a British husband and housekeeper, that the copy is correctly taken from my wife's entries in my pocket-book, checked impartially by the cook's slate:

A. M. 7.	Breakfast.—Tea, Toast, Half-quartern Loaf, Butter, Eggs, Bacon.
9:30.	First Morning Snack.—A glass of pale Sherry, and a plate of Mixed Biscuits.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.—(Not vouched for by the cook's slate.)—During the night of Monday Mrs. Bullwinkle partook, at intervals, of Caudle. At 3.40 A. M., on the morning of Tuesday, my wife was awakened by hearing the nurse walking up and down the room, and sighing bitterly. The following conversation then took place between them:

My Wife.—Are you ill?

Mrs. Bullwinkle.—No. Hungry.

I can certify that the above list correctly, and even moderately represents Mrs. Bullwinkle's daily bill of fare, for one month. I can assert, from my own observation, that every dish, at every hour of the day, which went up to her full, invariably came down from her empty. Mrs. Bullwinkle was not a wasteful eater. She could fully appreciate, in roast meat, for example, the great value of "lean;" but she was not, on that account, insensible to the humbler merits of fat, skin, and "ontside." All—emphatically, all—was fish that came to her net; and the net itself, as I can personally testify, was never once over-weighted and never out of order. I have watched, in the case of this perfectly unparalleled human cormorant, for symptoms of apoplexy, or at least of visible repletion, with a dreadful and absorbing interest: and have, on no occasion, been rewarded by making the smallest discovery.

Mrs. Bullwinkle was never, while in my service, even so much as partially intoxicated. Her face was never flushed; her articulation was never thickened; her brain was never confused; her movements were never uncertain. After the breakfast, the two morning snacks, and the dinner—all occurring within the space of six hours—she could move about the room with unimpeded freedom of action; could keep my wife and the baby in a state of the strictest discipline; could curtsy magnificently, when the unoffending master, whom she was eating out of house and home, entered the room; preserving her color, her equilibrium, and her staylaces, when she sank down and when she swelled up again, without the vestige of an apparent effort. During the month of her devastating residence under my roof, she had two hundred and forty-eight meals, including the snacks; and she went out of the house no larger and no redder than she came in. After the statement of one such fact as that, further comment is superfluous.

I leave the case in the hands of the medical and married public. I present it, as a problem, to physiological science. I offer it, as a warning, to British husbands with limited incomes. While I write these lines, while I give my married countrymen this friendly caution, my wife is weeping over the tradesmen's bills; my children are on half-allowance of food; my cook is worked off her legs; my purse is empty. Young husbands, and persons about to marry, commit to memory the description here given of my late monthly nurse! Avoid a tall and dignified woman, with a flowing style of conversation and impressively lady-like manners! Beware, my struggling friends, my fellow-toilers along the heavily-taxed highways of domestic happiness—beware of Mrs. Bullwinkle!

ENTHUSIASTIC APPLAUSE.—"At the Alcazar Theatre, in Rio Janeiro," says the correspondent of the Providence Journal, "I saw one Russian officer bring in at times during the evening all the flowers that he could carry, and shower them upon an actress. The next day he sent presents to the amount of two thousand dollars. This gentleman, when his floral offerings had given out, and no more were to be obtained, finished his gifts by scaling his cap at her. This was the signal for a scene to commence, and instantly hats of beaver, silk, and velvet, were showered upon the stage, and rings, gloves, handkerchiefs, canes, and umbrellas. Every one seemed to be trying to outvie his neighbor in shouting 'bravo' and 'viva;' the din was terrific. One man in the gallery, in his excitement, seized a large glass globe from the chandelier, and hurled it toward the stage, but missed his mark, and shattered it upon your correspondent's shoulder. At this point I thought it time to leave, which I did, and, with the fear of glass globes and a lame arm for monitors, have not patronized the Alcazar since."

THE London Athenæum says: "Outcroppings; or Selections from California Verse, has made a longer and deeper excitement on the Pacific coast than the loudest earthquake Those who were chosen for inside seats are not satisfied with their places or the room they occupy; and those who were left out altogether are in a terrible state of indignation; and so between "out-croppers" and non-"out-croppers," the poets of the coast and their friends keep the newspapers and the community in a real tea-pot tempest. Already another volume of poems by California writers is announced, wherein wrongs will be righted and out-croppers will be cropped. When it appears, and not before, peace will be restored and Californians will be allowed to resume their regular business of drinking champagne and speculating in Washoe stocks. The fall of Gould & Curry and other Comstock lode mines is doubtless owing to this counter excitement."

THE REDUCTION OF ORES.

THE essential condition of a thoroughly successful treatment of an average ore of a precious metal, whether by fire or by chemical solvents, is the complete reduction of the ore to an impalpable powder. Gold, for example, is often diffused in microscopic particles through the hard quartz or pyrite, in which it habitually occurs, and in a ton of the quartz or pyrites only a few ounces of metallic gold may be contained. It is perfectly obvious that we can never be sure of getting all the gold out of the enveloping quartz or pyrites unless the whole mass of ore be completely reduced to an impalpable powder as fine as the minutest particles of gold which it contains. The machinery now chiefly relied on for the reduction of ore to a powder consists of heavy stamps, which are raised by steam or water-power and allowed to fall upon the ore to be crushed. The action of stamps may be compared to that of a pestle and mortar. They produce a large proportion of fine sand and a little real dust; but the principal product of the best stamps is never an impalpable powder of microscopic fineness, but a sand, very many of whose particles will not pass through a sieve of fifty threads to the linear inch. Just here is an obstacle to the perfect working of the ores of the precious metals which has never yet been practically overcome, although almost every week for years some new process has been brought before those interested, theoretically so admirable that the utmost confidence in its success has been felt, and large amounts of money have been freely expended to put it to the test of practical operation. The back-yards of hundreds of houses in San Francisco are encumbered with the wrecks of machines, on each of which men have embarked their fortunes. Yet the fact that the present processes often fail to yield even one-half of the amount of metal which the accurate methods of chemical analysis reveal in the quartz, while thousands of mining enterprises are abandoned every year after their owners have been beggared, which would be most valuable properties if but a small degree of this loss could be overcome, constantly stimulates energetic enterprise as well as feverish speculation in the trial of new appliances, and the renewed trial of old methods under new circumstances. Until the frightful waste which attends the present processes of extracting the precious metals is overcome, they can be mined with profit only where a deposit is found which is not only comparatively rich, but the richness of which can be depended upon to extend far into the darkness of the earth—a case which does not occur one time in ten thousand where specimens of high promise are found at the outcrop. As long as mining is pursued with this uncertainty it must have, in most cases, more the character of gambling than of regular business capable of yielding sure returns to industry and intelligence, and must be a curse to those who engage in it and to the communities whose prosperity is dependent in any great degree upon them.

It is obvious that the subject is one of vast importance to our country, and though little confidence can reasonably be felt that any invention will prove of great value for general application until it has been for some time in actual use under the management of persons who have no interest in it, except that which is common to all owners of gold mines, the progress of experiments should have studious attention.

Machinery has been in operation during the last year in Boston, which seems to justify more than usual consideration. Two separate machines combine their different operations for the reduction of ore, previously broken into pieces of not more than three or four inches in diameter, to a fine flour or dust, which is at least a million times finer than average stamped ore. These two machines are, the "crusher," which converts the ore into a gravel mixed with sand, and the "pulverizer," which reduces the sand and gravel to the condition of a floating dust. The crusher may be described as follows: A circular iron table, three feet and a half in diameter, and weighing eight hundred pounds, revolves on an upright shaft at the rate of one thousand and twenty-five turns a minute. This whirling table forms the bottom of a cast-iron tub, eighteen inches deep, whose thick sides are perforated with numerous holes about half an inch in diameter. Upon the upper surface of the whirling table, and near its circumference, are bolted six, or sometimes eight blocks, made, like the lower sections of the perforated tub, of the hardest possible iron—Franklinite iron. When the velocity of the whirling table is between one thousand and one thousand and fifty revolutions a minute, the extreme ends of these cutting blocks move with a velocity of about two miles a minute. When there is no stone in the tub the table revolves freely with but little friction, and acts as a fly-wheel to regulate the other machinery, but the instant that material to be crushed is thrown into the tub, the consumption of steam-power begins, the lumps of stone are splintered into small fragments by concussion with each other and with the edges of the cutting blocks, and the gravel so produced is swept out through the holes in the grated sides of the tub.

The quantity of steam-power necessary to drive the table is to be approximately one and a half horse-power per hour for each ton of quartz crushed, five tons of quartz per hour requiring seven and a half horse-power, ten tons fifteen horse-power, and so on. It is recommended not to feed more material to the crusher than will exhaust ten to fifteen horse-power. So vague and uncertain, however, are all existing rules for the measurement of steam-power that too much weight should not be attached to these estimates of the power consumed. Of course, if a softer material than quartz be supplied to the crusher, less power will be consumed, or more material can be crushed in an hour.

It is evident that a machine thus constructed and driven at such an enormous velocity is abundantly capable of reducing even the hardest ores to a fine gravel at a very rapid rate; but the doubt naturally suggests itself, will not the machine be itself destroyed in the operation? This is a point upon which only extended practical experience in the use of the table can be decisive. It appears at present that the wear of the machine is confined to the exposed faces and edges of the splintering blocks and to the lower portion of the perforated sides of the tub. These wearing parts are so made as to be readily replaceable in sections. In general, the higher the velocity of the whirling table, the less it wears in proportion to the amount of work done. It is asserted that one set of cutting blocks will reduce one hundred and fifty to two hundred tons of ordinary quartz, and a much larger quantity of marble, sandstone, pyrites, or ordinary silver ores. The crusher yields incidentally a small proportion of fine dust, but it will not work economically as a pulverizer. The reduction of the gravel delivered by the whirling table to the condition of fine dust is accomplished by a distinct machine, the pulverizer. This pulverizer consists of four distinct parts or elements: a feeding mill, which furnishes a constant supply of the gravel to be reduced; an iron drum or cylinder containing an air wheel of peculiar construction; a fan-blower which draws air, and with it the dust formed, out of the cylinder just mentioned; and, lastly, dust chambers in which the product is collected. Beyond the dust chambers an auxiliary fan-blower draws air out of these chambers, and so relieves the pressure upon them and prevents leakage. This fan-blower is furnished with a set of arms or dashers, which dip into water and create a spray which wets down any dust fine enough to escape deposition in the dust chambers. The essential and peculiar part of this combination of machinery is the second element, the cylindrical drum with its air wheel. This cylinder is eighteen inches in breadth and forty-two in internal diameter. Within the drum, on the shaft or axis, are three sets of strong iron arms, eight arms in a set, which carry at their extremities "paddles" six inches long by three and a half in breadth, made of the hardest possible iron cast upon a wrought-iron skeleton of wire. The diameter of the "paddle-wheel" is forty inches, so that a space of one inch remains between the outer edge of each paddle and the cylinder. This wheel, with its twenty-four paddles, is driven at the rate of one thousand twenty-five revolutions a minute, so that the extreme edge of each paddle has a velocity of more than two miles a minute. A strong current of air is drawn through this pulverizing cylinder by the action of the fan-blower, and no air can enter or leave the cylinder except by the aid of this blower. The dust escapes from the mill through an opening at the centre, about the shaft; but no dust leaves the drum except as it is drawn out on the current of air induced by the fan-blower.

The question is: What is the action which goes on within the mill, converting gravel into an impalpable flour. The paddle-wheel is not sufficiently strong, and the steam-power consumed, per ton of dust, is not sufficiently great, for any process of hammering, crushing, or grinding. The most plausible answer to the question is, that the paddles act like fans, producing whirls or vortices of air which put the particles of gravel into very rapid motion, and that it is the mutual clashing and friction of the particles which produces the dust. The wake of each paddle is a dust-mill. The dust atoms are found under the microscope to be rounded; the gold in the dust is found rolled into pellets, the best form for the amalgamator; nails or other bits of metal which fall by accident into the mill, come out rounded as they had been rolled on a beach. The quality and quantity of the yield of the mill are determined by the velocity of the paddles, and by the velocity and volume of the current of air which passes through the cylinder. A low velocity of the paddles causes the yield to be coarse and abundant; at a high velocity, with too small a current of air, the mill becomes heated, and the yield is small but exceedingly fine; a freer current of air will give a larger but coarser product. The art of using the machine consists in a judicious regulation of the quantity and velocity of the current of air which is drawn through the drum. The management of both crusher and pulverizer, particularly of the latter, obviously requires an engineer of unusual intelligence and capacity. The velocities used are very high, belts may break or shafts spring, the breakers in the crusher and the paddles in the pulverizer require timely renewal, and the proper regulation of the air-current in the pulverizer requires acute observation and constant watchfulness. The wear of the inside of the case, or external cylinder, of the pulverizer is not very rapid, and as the interior is lined with boiler-plate iron, which can be cheaply and easily renewed, the only wear which occasions much inconvenience and expense is that of the paddles. The cost of this wear of the paddles is said to be about twenty cents for each ton of quartz pulverized. It is asserted that a pulverizer in perfect operation will reduce hard quartz from the size of gravel to fine dust at the rate of thirty-one hundred pounds an hour, and that of this quantity one-third will be as fine as bolted wheat flour, another third will all pass through a sieve of ten thousand meshes to the square inch, and the remaining one-third will all be greatly finer than the best products of stamps. The whirling-table will break the same quartz into gravel at the rate of eighteen tons per hour. One crusher will ordinarily feed ten or a dozen pulverizers. It is confidently stated that a single pulverizer, applied to the reduction of gold ores, delivers, with a small consumption of steam or water-power, as much powder as twenty ordinary stamps, and that the quality of the whole product will be beyond comparison finer than the best stamp work. For the better part of two years both the crusher and the pulverizer have been in actual operation at Boston, and have been tested upon a large variety of substances. Quartz, granite, feldspar, bones, copper ores, barytes, ochre, manganese, corn, and sundry paints and drugs, have all been successfully reduced in these omnivorous mills. Considering the quantity and quality of the work done by them, they compare favorably with other machines, now used for like purposes, both in respect to first cost and to expense of running. They are also comparatively light for transportation. Not to dwell upon the application to the service of the druggist, agriculturist, or manufacturer, these inventions seem to promise some real advance towards a better dealing with the most difficult problems of metallurgy.—The Nation.

"MEET ME BY MOONLIGHT."—An amusing adventure befel a poor young man yesterday, says the Indianola Times, who is employed as a delivery clerk in one of the express companies. The argument may be summed up as a love at first sight, and sore disappointment at the second. His name is probably George DeBarnwell. He is not in very prosperous circumstances, his coat is shabby and considerably out at the elbows, but in his soul there is an appreciation of the true and beautiful, a spark of divinity which enables him to rise above his humble station and aspire to nobler things than the delivery of boxes.

Yesterday George became enamored. It came to pass in this wise: While he was engaged in his customary avocation, a beautiful damsel, who chanced to pass by, requested him to perform some menial service for her. DeBarnwell was only too happy to comply, and after having rendered her the desired assistance, she thanked him with a smile so sweet that George felt emboldened to enter into conversation. He even went so far as to request the pleasure of an interview in the evening, to which proposition the fair lady assented. The hour and place of meeting was agreed upon, and George DeBarnwell felt that he had achieved a victory. He cast his eyes, however, upon his shabby garments, and for the first time in his life he perceived the disadvantages of poverty. He could not present himself before her in such a guise. Accordingly he borrowed a coat from a friend, a hat from another, a pair of pantaloons from a third, and, after undergoing a course of treatment at the hands of Tony Delight, and an infinite deal of preparation otherwise, he presented himself at the appointed time near the house of his maiden on Illinois street. The evening was bitter cold, and no maiden appeared, and after enduring it for an hour and a half the lover was about to depart in despair when a quiet-looking individual, who had been regarding him for some time, walked up and politely inquired if he was Mr. DeBarnwell.

"That is my name," said the youth, somewhat surprised.

"Ah! I'm glad I have met you," quoth the stranger; "my daughter regrets that she cannot meet you this evening, and requested me to come instead. Where shall we go?"

The lover was already blue with cold, but he turned considerably bluer at the unexpected denouement. We shall not record his reply to the parent. It was a very natural one under the circumstances, but it implied an invitation, or rather a command, which few reasonable mortals, who entertain prospects of salvation, would care to obey.

"GRANDMOTHER," said Ike, seriously, to Mrs. Partington, "have you heard the report that the Prince of Wales's baby has not got all his fingers on one hand, and that both his legs are not right?" "Lor' bless me!" exclaimed the old lady. "Then how could he ever wield the sceptre of the realm, or walk as he ought to?" Ike, however, pretended not to hear the remark, but began clipping the cat's whiskers, and grinning to think that his grandmother did not see that nobody has all the fingers on one hand, nor anybody two right legs.

VERY SEVERE.—"Ah!" said a conceited young parson, "I have this afternoon been preaching to a congregation of asses." "Then that was the reason why you called them beloved brethren," replied a strong-minded lady.

THE LOVE OF A SHORT-HAND WRITER.

OF all the short-hand writers in the precincts of Lincoln's Inn, Cornelius Bubb stood the highest in matter of inches. He was six feet six, and very thin from constant lack of sleep in term time. He was known in the Lane as the Man in Black—he had black clothes, black hair, and black looks. He was very sharp: his walk was sharp, his tongue was sharp, and his pen was sharp. The more business he got, the worse his temper grew; but it was all bark—there was no bite in it. If he scolded a poor wandering short-hand clerk one night, he was none the less ready to give him another job the next, should he happen to call. The most deadly offence in his eye was correctness. He could be spiteful to clerks who were clever enough to give no occasion for criticism. He gave the preference over such to clerks who were human, and who erred. These gave a nightly feast to his irony and sarcasm. Disappoint him of his meal, be as sharp and immaculate in copying from your short-hand notes as himself, and you forfeited his friendship forever. You were a conceited fellow—an unpleasant companion from four P. M. to perhaps the small hours of the morning.

One Thursday night in November, when Michaelmas Term was a week old, Mr. Bubb strode along from his modest dining-place through the cold fog in the Lane towards his office. He stepped quickly up the dark, unlighted staircase, and stooped into his rooms. There were only some thirty or forty folios to write out, and then he was free to use a ticket for the Opera given him by a friend. In the outer or clerks' office, was his established clerk—a boy of ten years, who lived in the regions below with his mother. There was also a stranger waiting—a young man with a notebook in his hand.

"Nothing to night," said Bubb, who could not yet afford to pay others for doing what he could do himself. The stranger turned to go.

"If you please, sir," said the Boy, "Hume and Smollett have sent round to say they want the evidence in Jones and Perkins by nine o'clock to-morrow."

"What!" cried the disappointed playgoer.

The boy repeated his message.

"Why, there's three hundred folios of it, and I've told everybody I shouldn't want them. Run down the Lane, and if you don't find some of them, never show your useless face here again. Run!" The boy disappeared on his errand. "And now," said Bubb, turning to the stranger, who had lingered, "you are in for it. There's three hundred folios to do before you leave this office."

"Very well, sir."

This philosophic reply caused Bubb to scrutinize the stranger more narrowly. He was dressed in an Inverness cape; he held his round hat respectfully in one hand, and a brand new reporter's notebook in the other. He looked very young; his voice was not broken; his cheeks were smooth, and free, as yet, from whiskers; his dark hair was short and curly; his black eyes had a merry look in them; in fine, he was a very good-looking boy.

"I have never seen you before," remarked Bubb. "Where did you learn short-hand?"

"At home, sir."

"Have you ever done such work as mine before?"

"No, sir."

"Good gracious! Then perhaps you can't do it? I am sure you can't. You don't look as if you could. And what's to become of me? Do you know what three hundred folios mean?"

"No, sir."

"I thought not," said Bubb, contemptuously. "Well, then, I'll tell you; its more than twelve hours' hard work. And what will become of me? If that boy doesn't find some help, I'll hang him."

"It is true, sir, that I have never done this work before," persisted the short-hand novice, "but you can't tell whether I can do it or not till I have tried."

"An Irishman said something like that when he was asked if he could play the violin," remarked Bubb, severely.

Here his boy-clerk returned. "I can see nothing but the fog, sir, if you please."

Under the pressure of business, his master deigned no reply but a look. "What is your name?" he demanded of his would-be assistant.

"John Smith, sir."

"A very remarkable one. Sit down opposite me there, and tell me if I read too fast." He opened the notebook in which he had taken down the evidence in Jones vs. Perkins, and began to read aloud. John Smith wrote it down in his own short-hand in the note-book he had brought with him, beginning, the questions at the extreme left, and the answers in the middle of the page. He had nearly filled a couple of slips, when Bubb stopped suddenly and watched how far he was behind. Only four or five words.

"Read!" said Bubb.

John Smith read it unhesitatingly. Bubb tried hard not to feel pleased, and failed.

"Write it out on this paper. Begin six lines from the bottom—I will put the heading in afterwards—and mind, put the 'Qs' and 'As' in the margin."

Without a word, John Smith did as directed, and that in a swift, clear handwriting.

"Don't leave blanks," said Bubb, "and don't puzzle over a word you can't make out at once; ask me."

But Smith had nothing to ask.

"You'll do," remarked Bubb, pithily. A bright thought struck him. "You can't expect, Mr. Smith, the same pay as an experienced hand. Twopence per folio is what such a man gets, and we reckon eight folios in a sheet of evidence. I'll give you three-half-pence; will that do?"

"Yes, sir," replied Smith, humbly. So at their work they went—Bubb dictating about fifty folios at a time to Smith, with directions to fit it on the right side of a sheet, and then copying out himself the continuation from his own note-book. They worked on thus without interruption, save a cup of tea and a hastily swallowed crust, till between three and four the next morning, when all the evidence was written fairly out.

"Come as soon after three this afternoon as you can," said Bubb, as he parted with his new assistant at the door of the office; "I have a case in Kindersley's court." Bubb returned to read over, page, and stitch in a neat cover his many sheets of manuscript. Then he made himself a bed on the couch in his own office, and slept soundly till eight o'clock, when his boy-clerk came up from the kitchen with his breakfast.

That night the offices of Mr. Bubb presented a noisy and busy scene. The outer one was crowded with assistants, who smoked, and wrote, and talked, and sent out the boy for beer, which they passed to each other under the table—who were constantly asking questions, and making mistakes, and occasionally swearing, sotto voce. The door of Mr. Bubb's private office was ajar, and from thence his snarl and sneer came to them in rapid sequence. All the evening, they had been taking turns to be dictated to at Mr. Bubb's desk, and the wrangling between him and his slow dictatees—his erring favorites—was ever in the ears of all. The law-stationer's boy had worried Bubb into a state of fury. But he never became confused; his clear head revelled in the general distraction. Not so his new assistant, John Smith; he had asked leave early in the evening to work in Mr. Bubb's room.

"As you like—on the stairs, if you please, so long as you get it done," said his master.

It was eleven o'clock; Bubb had given out the last of his notes, and the law-stationer's boy was snoring in a corner, ready to be shaken up for the last sheets. Near them was seated young Smith, straining hard to keep his eyes open, and forcing sore, reluctant fingers to finish his task. An assistant brought in the last of his work, and then made a speedy exit. But his master's tongue followed him. Running his eye maliciously over the sheets, Bubb cried out: "I say, Dixon, do you mean to say you did this yourself?"

"Yes, sir," responded the assistant from the outer room.

"I can't believe you, Dixon," replied Mr. Bubb; "there are only sixteen words missplelt." A loud laugh from his comrades. At this moment the new assistant gave in—his head dropping helplessly on to the desk. Bubb jumped up, and raised him gently, and was about to unfasten his necktie and waistcoat, when, with an exclamation of dismay, he drew back as if he had burnt his fingers. Smith opened his eyes, and revived wearily.

"I thought you had fallen asleep, Mr. Smith," said Bubb, in a strangely tender tone. "Have you much to do?"

"No, sir." And poor Smith went at it again, while Bubb watched him curiously.

"Dixon," he called out, "have you gone yet?" "No, sir."

"Then, come here; I want you." Dixon entered the sanctum. "Here's our new friend very tired; perhaps you don't mind seeing him home. He has nearly finished."

Smith was too fatigued to object, if he had any objections: indeed, he had to lean very heavily on the arm of the good-natured Dixon."

"Come to-morrow with your bill," said Bubb, as they left. "The fresh air will revive you. You will take care of the boy, Dixon."

In the outer office, among the seasoned oldsters, the boy excited much sympathy. Ignoring in their kindness the eye of Bubb, they openly offered him their pewter pots to drink from. Smith faintly thanked them, and declined.

On Saturday morning, Smith presented his first account to Mr. Bubb in that gentleman's private office. He paid it at once, cutting off an odd ninepence for luck, as he said. Bubb always contrived to pay first accounts when due; it made people's minds easier under any delays that might take place with other accounts. Smith was retiring with his well-earned money, when Bubb, clearing his throat, detained him with these words: "Mr. Smith, I have nothing to do with your private affairs; you do what I pay you to do; still—still I think you ought to give me a reference."

Smith blushed like a girl, and stammered out: "I can give you a note to Dr. P—— of Bloomsbury; he knows me."

Mr. Bubb eagerly assented. "How will he word it?" thought he. His curiosity was pictured so plainly in his face, that Smith, with a smile, politely handed it to him to read. "Dr. P—— is earnestly begged to say a word of recommendation in favor of his young friends the Smiths." Bubb felt disappointed. He took some interest in this chesp and able short-hand writer, and the clever vagueness of the note still kept him in the dark. He watched Smith from the office window till he was out of sight, and then started for Dr. P——'s. The doctor was very busy; could spare Mr. Bubb only two minutes.

"Seeking work from you, sir, I presume? Well, the Smiths are highly respectable and trustworthy: poor from a misfortune. Take my guarantee for any materials however costly you may trust them with, whatever your business may be. Good morning, sir."

"Excuse me; I am a cautious man," said Mr. Bubb. "What misfortune?"

"The father—wealthy man—turned his son out of doors. The daughter left with him, and will not return till he is forgiven. The son is consumptive—won't live long. Good morning, sir. You have my guarantee."

On his way back, the sharp-tongued short-hand writer composed a beautiful romance, with himself for the hero, and his new assistant for heroine. The plot ran thus: The discarded son of a wealthy father is ill, and Mr. Bubb finds employment for his faithful sister at a reduction only of a halfpenny a folio. She is grateful; she is also not insensible to his personal charms—she loves him. The discarded and consumptive son dies. The wealthy father calls back his daughter to his penitent bosom; and at the expiration of the fashionable term of mourning, Mr. Bubb marries his late charming assistant, now heiress at law to her father's wealth.

For the remaining weeks of the term, however other assistants fared, there was always something for young Smith. For him Mr. Bubb suspended his economical habit; he sat idle himself rather than turn young Smith away. But as business chanced to be very brisk, this was very seldom the case. Dixon always accompanied Smith home, waiting for his younger comrade, if it were necessary. Mr. Bubb had always to read over and correct when his assistants were done. But he was not jealous of a man who was only five feet four, and made mistakes in spelling; besides, the fellow did not know Smith's secret, and was luckily too stupid to find it out. Meanwhile, Mr. Bubb set about displaying himself in the eyes of John Smith as an unparalleled short-hand writer and a magnanimous man. As luck would have it, he had a heavy case nearly every day, and the usual lot of cheap incapables to help him to get it out. These he made a good foil for his own sharpness, and he did not spare them in that capacity. He dictated from his notes twice as fast as he had had to write himself; and when the slow short-hand writer timidly asked him for a word three sentences back from where he was reading, he would look towards Smith for sympathy, and assume the air of a contemptuous martyr. He did not bully his men so much as of wont, nor did he so frequently make them copy their work over on account of a blot or an erasure. His voice, too, lost much of its acrimonious tone: towards Smith, indeed, it was sickly sweet. In an easy chair, with nothing to do, young Smith might have had leisure to admire his master towering morally as well as physically above his subordinates; but bending all the night over ill-written, short-hand characters, and puzzling over the mysteries of "fitting in," he noted little of the change which was a common topic among his fellows. They, you may be sure, did not neglect to take advantage of the governor's unaccountable softness. They smoked more, wrangled more, and had more beer in. They turned saucy to him.

"I can't make this word out," remarked Mr. Bubb, coming to a sudden stop in his dictation; "it is strange I can't make it out, for it is written as plainly—so very plain."

"Then," said the assistant, "don't write it so plain the next time."

But Mr. Bubb bore all for the sake of the future—for the sake of the third volume of his romance. However, the cloud over the hot sun of his temper passed suddenly away, and his unhappy assistants were scorched again worse than ever. This was on the last day of Michaelmas Term. On that night, for the first time, Smith did not appear at his accustomed desk. It was a busy night, and his other assistants, so far as erring went, were more human than ever. Bubb missed the quiet, accurate, and ready pen of Smith. He was also tormented by other feelings. These were confirmed when, on the next day, Saturday, Smith did not present his weekly bill as usual. Had he lost him forever? Would his grand romance turn out an illusion, after all the fine opportunities of temper he had given up?

That evening, he called again upon his reference, Dr. P——. He was as busy as ever, and it was not till Bubb had waited half an hour that he popped his head into the room where Bubb was pacing about impatiently, and said, "Oh, it is you. Well, a reconciliation has been effected. Want no more work. Good evening, sir."

Bubb caught him in the passage, as he was stepping back to his surgery. "Will you give me the address? There is money due, sir."

"Ah," said the doctor, "honest man! Send the money here; I will forward it."

"And a letter?"

"Yes, anything. Good evening."

Bubb went back to his office revolving a love-letter in his mind. "If," thought he, "her short-hand had been the same system as mine, what a lot I could have said!"

The letter was very characteristic. It ran thus:

"My Dear Miss Smith: I send you with this one pound eighteen and eightpence halfpenny, per favor of Dr. P——, for which please forward receipt. Why should you be afraid of letting me know your address? You were not afraid of working beside me night after night in an illegal disguise. Was I ever harsh to you? Did I ever make you write a single sheet over again? Did I ever find fault with your spelling or punctuation? Did I not allow you to estimate the number of folios yourself, and did I ever cut you down, as I do the other fellows? Did I not always read slowly to you, not that you require it, for you are a beautiful short hand writer, as well as a beautiful woman!"

"That's capitally turned," said Bubb to himself, proudly. "I wonder what her Christian name is? She called herself John Smith—perhap's it's Jane. He wrote on:

"My darling Jane, I love you. I think I can even now see your ready, pretty little fingers taking down the words from my lips. Oh, do let me see you again! Let me see you in the dress proper to you, in which I am sure, my dearest Jane, you must be irresistible. Once your kind master, now your imploring lover, Cornelius Bubb.

"P. S.—Don't forget to send a receipt."

But no answer ever came to this moving epistle, and the cruel silence brought Bubb to such a desponding state, that probably the advent of Hilary Term alone saved his life. Indeed, so disgusted was he with human life, that on Christmas Day he made his landlady, notwithstanding her many protestations, provide a plate of cold boiled beef for his dinner. Hilary Term brought healthful work, his gang of incompetents, and the exhilarating use of his bitter tongue.

One night he was in one of his customary fixes, out of which, somehow, he always contrived to get, without loss of professional reputation. He had received unexpected orders to write out some old notes by the next day, and he had nobody to help him. For reasons of his own he would trust solely to wandering clerks. One of these came in—it was Dixon. He had not seen him since Smith's disappearance.

"Good evening, Mr. Bubb; you owe me fifteen and six," said Dixon, flinging down his bill.

"Certainly, my dear boy; why did you not bring it before?" and Mr. Bubb, pulling a handful of silver out of his pocket, and paying the claim without even a grumble. He felt as a sergeant might feel slipping the shilling into the hand of a recruit. "You are in luck, my boy, to-night," he said to Dixon; "there are two hundred folios for us to get through."

"Are there?" said Dixon, drily, as he receipted his bill.

"Yes, come; look sharp, and get to your desk."

"I am going to the theatre, Mr. Bubb, with a friend," replied Dixon, with a grin.

Bubb tried hard, but he could not speak—it was a kind of gasp.

Dixon went on: "The fact is, I have come into—that is, I am now independent of short-hand."

"Then what did you want with my fifteen shillings?" asked Bubb, who felt himself robbed on false pretences.

"Here, my lad," said Dixon to the boy, "here is five shillings for you." This act of munificence confirmed Dixon's story. He must have fallen into some good thing.

"I wish I had that young Smith here," said Bubb, regretfully, for he was again in a fix.

"I can tell you," said Dixon, "what has become of him. He has been sent by his father to Paris to study medicine—at least, so his sister told me."

"What! you know his sister?" asked Bubb, eagerly.

"Yes. The fact is, I am—I am engaged to be married to her."

"To her that used to come here?"

"What the devil do you mean by that, Mr. Bubb?" demanded Dixon, in rather fierce tones.

Bubb rose and twisted his chair between them, so that Dixon might not be tempted to any foolishness. He temporized: "I meant to say, Dixon, how did you become acquainted with the family?"

"Oh, I don't mind telling you that. Although my father was a poor barrister, and died before he got much practice, I have a few friends left, and it was at the house of one of these that I met the sister of the young gentleman who used to come here when he was under a cloud. She was so like her brother I was accustomed to walk home with, that I was confounded at first, and I suspected—that is, she told me they were twins, and that accounted for the resemblance. She is now waiting for me to take her to Drury Lane. Good by, Mr. Bubb."

From that day, no short-hand writer without a beard durst present himself at Bubb's office, and those with beards deplore their ill-luck in having to go.

We acknowledge the receipt of the following new books from A. Roman & Co., which will be noticed hereafter: Unto this Last, Lucy Arlyn, Stonewall Jackson, The Cecilias, and Frederick the Great.

LOOSE LEAVES FROM A YOUNG LADY'S JOURNAL.

[To the Editor of The Californian—Dear Sir: As I was walking through a garden the other day, I found scattered about pages which seemed extracts from a young lady's diary. I take the liberty to send them to you, entitled "Loose Leaves from a Young Lady's Journal." Respectfully, Dexnar Steuart.]

NUMBER THREE.

August 8th, 1862.

"DID your ever suffer from apprehensions of physical destitution, Sarah?" I asked to-day. "Do you know I am haunted by an impression that I shall yet be very, very poor."

"Only one type of the megrins, Nett. But, if you really see the 'wolf coming,' why not let your friend, Mr. Smith take you under his protection? He stands ready to enact Putnam for you at any day."

"Because I would rather be a wife when I marry than a mere 'help-eat-meat,' as Mrs. Jencks terms her daughter-in-law. I do wish, Sarah, that you would let Mr. Smith be 'nameless now and evermore.'"

"But I won't limit you to that gentleman. Some one else, then?"

"It is really a pity that all of us poor women cannot be placed as was Eve, with our Adam right before our eyes—no election to make, no results to risk, in accepting John or refusing Harry; but take the one present, and never have any 'might have been' to cry over. But marriage, now-a-days, is too often like coasting—a smooth slide down the long hill during the brief courtship, and then a steep and weary ascent, dragging the heavy sled upwards for the rest of life."

"And that is worse than Poverty?"

"Yes, Nettie. Never be starved into the belief that material wealth can supply all wants, or that bodily hunger is Famine's self. 'Tis but her youngest, weakest child—a mere pigwidgeon beside the mother. A happy, trusting girl often 'marries well,' as the phrase goes, and finds Life not a dream, but a waking from a dream, bright, warm and vivid, to a cold, dreary reality. Many a tombstone might truthfully be inscribed:

Here lies a woman's hungry heart,
Perished for want of bread."

"Then, practical as you pride yourself upon being, you yet believe in Love and a cottage, Sarah?"

"Yes, with specified accompaniments. Love alone will not furnish the cottage, but it will go far towards it. Life is not dependent upon Luxury, and one can glorify God by a simple, rush-light, even without silver lamp or golden candlestick. Never lose faith in old-fashioned Love, yet remember for consolation the maxim of Pythagoras, 'Many things, especially Love, are best learned late.' Enjoy your blissful ignorance, and 'let to-morrow take care of itself.' Be sound asleep when Poverty passes—he'll not think it worth his while to wake you." And Sarah laughed cheerily at the conclusion of her sage advice.

But I'm nearer realizing my poverty-stricken fancies than she imagines—nearer than I would confess to any but you, trusty old Journal. The dim spectre so long haunting me has embodied itself and taken me by the hand. Here it is—My last dollar! Nor can I guess whence its successors, if any it shall have, will glisten. My monetary horizon is not relieved even by a lone 'greenback.' 'Spizzerinktum,' as these Mississippi boatmen term both coin and currency, is for me among those objects 'lost to sight, to memory dear.'"

Yet, wonder of psychology, I am placid and content if not so songful as the little bird "fornenst" my window, whose good night to the setting sun betrays no fear that to-morrow it will find him supperless. Once I would have pictured myself bending over a pan of charcoal at this crisis. Now I laugh at the bygone "I." It surely is my last dollar, yet I lack a realizing sense of its solitariness. In vain I search each nook and corner. No hidden treasure has laid itself up for "a rainy day." Ah, that rainy day, whose drops have pattered over my shoulders in many a fit of gloomy foreboding, drops thicker than thistles, heavy as bullets. Well that day is here, and I am skipping about in the shower, skin-wet but heart-dry. Not because conscious of a hope hung on earth or air, though we all live on rainbows more than we think, even those of us who see but the wrong side of them Poverty has exemptions, compensations, and no trifling ones. To buy or not to buy is no longer a perplexity. Lovely bonnets and charming mantles are regarded with an indifference edifying to Diogenes. And though I mentally remark upon the display which I occasionally see, "Heaven sends almonds to those who have no teeth," yet which would you rather have, Journal, teeth or almonds? Do the destitute always experience this strange independence of to-morrow? Does Imagination invest Want with more than legitimate terror, or is it that the wind and the shorn lamb are both so tempered that it frolics and frisks in spite of its fleecelessness? I am sometimes tempted to envy my friends of ample means and elegant surroundings: yet after all I believe the chief difference between poor and rich to be this: to one our Father gives daily bread by the piece, to the other by the pantryful, and enough is enough. I can almost suppose the beatitude applies to the poor in specie as well as "the poor in spirit" from this lightheartedness, this sense of repose in the All Love. There's actually something pleasant in this shifting to a bountiful Providence the responsibility of one's sustenance. And odd feeling of "I've done what I can, and yet here's my last dollar. If I starve or freeze 'tis not my fault." And conscious of personal innocence in any untimely end awaiting me, I proceed to Sarah's assistance, gaily whistling "Rally Round the Flag" in the style of young Horace Greeley—the potter's pestering, pilfering son—whose name alone saves him from a whipping every day.

Saturday, September, 1862.

Something has turned up for Mr. Micawber, or rather, He who sent ravens to Elijah has remembered my needs. Miss Meldrum, who has a select school for young ladies here, wishes to be absent for a time, and engages me to fill her place, giving a liberal advance payment for my services. So, since Monday morning I have been at my post. The pupils I find lovable, pretty girls, but strangely illiterate, many of them. Miss Meldrum prepared me for surprises, and so my risible propensities have been quite controlled.

I was amused, Wednesday morning, in the reception of two new scholars. A clever, manly appearing farmer, living some twenty miles distant, accompanied by two daughters, applied for their admission, and, when the business was concluded, remarked, "Wall, mistress, I was raised in an old-fashioned way, and I've raised my gals old-fashioned; but I reckon it don't do now-a-days. I haint no occasion to complain on 'em, but, if you'd mind 'em close and make 'em do like the rest, I'd take it mighty kind of you. They're a little unthoughted onst in a while." And with a rustic politeness he took his leave.

During this conversation, one of the misses had been dancing about the room, examining with curious scrutiny all its belongings. She is really lively and pretty—one of those girls whose ear-rings you remember. I opened acquaintance with the standard interrogative, "How are you this morning?" "Jest tolerable," replied the skipping fairy, in a drawl which would have done credit to a rheumatic Methuselah. She was evidently "on her manners," in Aunt Winnie's phrase.

"Will you give me your name to enter on the list?" "Roanoke Rogers—Rono for short." "And your sister's?" "Tennessee Rogers." I was wondering how I could entertain the new-comers until the arrival of the other pupils, when Miss Rono assumed the initiative. "Long till books is in, mistress?" I looked an interrogation point, I suppose, for she repeated, "Long till books is in?" With a Yankee guess I replied, "About half an hour. You may be arranging your desk." "Where's it at?" "That next the window." "I've been studying, miss, if you won't let Tennie sit along of me. She could help me in rethmetic, and I ain't good at figurin'. 'Twould be sociable, too, for we've hearn that town girls is stuck up and choosy, and we'd a heap rather be together." "Oh, yes; you may have that double desk, if you prefer. I hope you will enjoy being here after a little." "I allow to, right smart, after I'm acquainted like."

After a long silence, I addressed Tennie, who had scarcely spoken. "You're a good Union girl and for the war, I suppose?" "Not much I ain't. I'd ruther kiss Jeff. Davis' great toe seven times a year that have my brother Will hurt." And her eyes filled with tears at mentioning her soldier-brother. She had touched a responsive chord in my own heart, and with becoming patriotism, I yet am no stronger in spirit than little Tennie.

I have been teaching the pupils a morning prayer in which they all unite. Tennie came to me at recess yesterday, and whispered confidentially: "Mistress, I don't know nothin' about them kind of prayers, but I like 'em lots. Won't you learn me a whole heap of 'em?" I see teaching will be no tedious task, for a few weeks at least, with all these diverse characters to study.

FILIO DESIDERATISSIMO.

WHEN I paint thee what thou mightest be,
When I think on what thou art,
Trace thine image in my memory,
Search that memory through mine heart—
Then I feel how widely parted
Is that other side from this:
What a gulf divides our fancy
From that unimagined bliss.

Sometimes by my side thou walkest,
Grown a stripling tall and fair,
Godlike in thine youthful beauty,
But oh, not as thou art there!
All thine interests springing in thee,
Gushing toward me fresh and clear,
Fancy-drawn from things around me,
Speak not of that nobler sphere.

Day by day, and every moment,
Always present, never sought,
Standing, looking, speaking, loving,
Gliding through the realms of thought,
O my child, my spirit's presence,
Dearest comfort, nearest joy,
All these nine long years where art thou,
Where, and what, mine angel boy!

TO STOCKTON AND NEWPORT.

SAN FRANCISCO, SUNDAY, April 15, 1866.

OF course I might just as easily have said, MONDAY, April 16th, and saved some good Christian a twinge—but what's the use of living a lie? there's too much of that sort of thing, you know. I have lately been to Stockton, and people who come away from there are expected to be reasonable. Don't be alarmed: I'm not going to tell you what hotel I honored with presence, nor whether the landlord was affable, etc. Little details of that sort—though tourists generally appear to derive much satisfaction from their rehearsal—give one, after seven or eight hundred perusals, a faint suspicion of sameness.

Neither would I mention the name of Capt. Bromley, of the Cornelia, with whom I voyaged, only that, besides being a good fellow, and a competent, the captain has the honor of being a namesake of that unswerving patriot and genial advertiser, Major-General George T. Bromley, who not only knows how to keep a hotel but gives his talents practical application at the newly-opened Pacific Ocean House, Santa Cruz. A cruise with the Captain—who possesses much of that urbanity and considerateness which so eminently distinguishes the General—could not be other than pleasant.

In regard to Stockton: it is a high old place—which original observation does not have reference to its elevation above the level of the sea, nor to the absence of "life-giving, pure cold water" from the list of beverages approved by its inhabitants. No indeed, it is flat and sober. But it is deservedly high in the estimation of Meador & Co., (the copper-fastened firm.) and all others who can make money by stopping there. (As the roads leading thence to the mines are well provided with "Stand and deliver!"-ers, many could at least save money by remaining.)

They had a little fire while I was there. The scene of the conflagration was not laid in a clothing-store, so I cannot claim that it was gotten up in honor of my visit. An old distillery, so dilapidated that it scarcely could keep up a weak-spirited struggle for existence, made an expiring effort, and, recalling some of its wonted fire, carried with it to destruction the adjoining buildings. The Agricultural Hall was partly destroyed. In regard to the flames communicating with the interior of this useful and ornamental edifice, I intended to say that they gained entrance by way of the balcony in front, and that had the "machine" been in good order the honest farmers of San Joaquin might have been spared the pain, now in store, of seeing the merchants and other interested parties in Stockton "come down" and rebuild the Pavilion; but as I unwittingly passed the point where I intend to ring in a quotation about the flames of the

'Still, so gently o'er it stealing,

I refrain from any particular account. In fact, as the affair will be nearly two weeks old when this sees the light of print, I don't feel bound to treat it as a startling news item.

The last performance given by that old distillery reminded me of a "battle-royal," in a cock-pit to which a friend of mine was "inveigled" a few years ago: There were twenty or thirty cocks in the ring, and the last one able to walk was to take the purse. The battle went on famously for a while, until but one rooster—known as the "Gray Champion," and which had been the favorite from the start—was able to stand erect. Gallantly he stepped around the ring, spurning with his foot this wounded enemy, and crowing in triumph over the dead body of that one, until, just as the money was about to be given up and the "Gray Champion" conveyed with all the honors to his coop, the said G. C. committed the error of stepping upon a little blueish, mean-looking chicken which had been the first to succumb to the influence of an unpleasantly inserted spur. The little fellow was heeled, and not lifeless by a long jump; up went his gaff, and down came the "Champion," to get-up-and-git no more for ever. The insignificant bird which had thus quietly bided its time and struck the right rooster in the right place, strutted about as proudly as if he'd done all the killing, and of course was declared winner.

This little anecdote may be thought by the hypercritical somewhat foreign to the distillery matter. If it is, just apply it to something else, and save me the expense of striking it out. (THE CALIFORNIAN pays me by the column, and its columns are fearfully broad.)

To return to Stockton—excuse me, I don't mean that exactly, but to resume my remarks in regard to it: There seem to be three thriving businesses going on at this time—videlicit: getting copper, getting married, and getting divorced. Of the three, the last is probably not the least—at all events, it is not the least talked-of.

Well, they tell me they havn't had a theatrical entertainment for a long time, and something must be done to relieve the monotony. "Going a gal-ing" is the chief source of amusement to the young men—and Laird's "Liquid Pearl" is the gainer to a considerable extent in consequence of this proclivity.

Wine-making is also a leading interest, more with a view to export than home consumption. One of the principal vine-growers told me that his wine was sold mainly in New York and Boston; very little was required in Stockton. Not willing that all the credit of sustaining so useful a branch of industry should accrue to Eastern cities, I purchased a bottle; handed the vintner a gold-piece of modest dimensions, and was requested to take a seat, as it would be necessary to send out for "change." "Just over to the next house," said the proprietor. One peculiarity about Stockton is that the "next house" is, in not a few instances, about an hour's travel distant. So it proved to be in this case, and the merchant went to his dinner, leaving me to reflect upon all the advantages arising from a trade with New York and Boston, until the return of the clerk dissipated a gentle apprehension that the latter had been sent to one of the Eastern cities for the change.

The Insane Asylum is also quite a "feature." Patients who are mildly insane when received, and those who have nearly recovered under treatment, are permitted to enjoy the open air and to amuse themselves in making garden, chopping wood, washing clothes, and other forms of light and innocent recreation. The grounds are beautifully laid out, the fair is said to be excellent, and the institution is so well-liked that many patients do not care to be pronounced "cured." Had not business of exceedingly urgent and profitable nature demanded my presence in San Francisco, I do not know but that I should have been tempted to go upon the "mildly insane" list.

I was, at all events, so far influenced by the "surroundings," that upon hearing a prediction that the Civil Rights Bill would be passed over the President's veto, I blundered into the remark that such a measure was in keeping with the progress of liberal sentiments; even now we had Ah Coon for Mayor of San Francisco—why should we not make way for a Ty-coon in Washington?

I was impelled to leave immediately after this rash effort, and did not feel perfectly safe until we had passed the "up" boat.

On my way down, I heard considerable about Antioch and the coal mines. Aside from the prosperity incident to the development of the best coal deposits in the world, it is worthy of note that the village of Antioch is within half a day's journey of the City of Newport. Benicia enjoys a like happiness. I own one of the finest lots in Newport; Newport has some of the best laid out streets I ever saw on a map—and since I bought my lot I learn that its water-privileges are unequalled. Nobody need come foolishing round trying to by my property. It's not for sale. I have been there, and although the curtain of night had been rung down before my arrival, I am satisfied it's the veritable "place for the gold where they fin(d) it." [I can't see why old Job said "fine" it—Fine what? This question don't appear to have bothered anybody lately. I remember that that "little typographical error," as it was frequently pronounced was a source of considerable uneasiness to those readers of THE CALIFORNIAN who didn't meet very regularly with their Bible-classes, a couple of years ago.] I intend visiting my place again some time next year — probably during the fishing season. A friend assures me that any port is better than *No*port. I pause to consider whether the remark should be taken as the offspring of envy or as the liquid truth.

EMSTAHT.

THACKERAY tells of an Irish woman begging alms from him, who, when she saw him put his hand in his pockets, cried, "May the blessings of God follow you all your life," but when he only pulled out his snuff-box, immediately added, "and never overtake ye."

IN a multitude of counsellors there may be much wisdom, but there is confusion, too.

THE GOLDEN LILY.

THERE are various traditions as to the origin of the Golden Lily upon the shield of France. Among these, is the following incident, said to have occurred in the latter part of the eleventh century, during the reign of Philip Augustus.

The Prince was only fifteen when he ascended the throne; but the strong hand with which he seized the reigns of government, awing the turbulent nobles and protecting the common people against their aggressions, soon convinced them that he was not to be despised for his youth.

Though by this course he greatly endeared himself to the mass of his subjects, his life was more than once threatened, and even attempted; but these plots invariably originated among the haughty nobles, who were restive under the restraints imposed upon them by the king's strong arm, and his just and kindly heart.

In the summer of the eleventh year of his reign, weary of the cares of state, Philip retired with his Court to his royal residence at Chaumont which was a favorite resort to him.

Among his train was Geoffrey, Count de Neville, the natural son of Louis VII., the king's half-brother. He was a mild and inoffensive man, apparently well-contented with the title and estate conferred by the late king upon his mother, and which he had inherited upon her death; but, unfortunately, he married a haughty, ambitious woman, who was but illy-inclined to forego her claims to royalty.

At the death of Louis, she openly asserted that there had been a secret marriage between him and the late Countess de Neville, and upon the head of her son should rest the crown of France, he being the eldest-born; she urged her husband to assert his claims. But this the Count refused to do, being ill-fitted by nature to act a part requiring more than usual energy and ability, besides entertaining too strong an affection for the young king, who had treated him with unusual kindness, to seek to deprive him of his rightful inheritance.

If Philip heard of the pretensions which the Countess set forth, he manifested no outward token of displeasure or distrust. On the contrary, he gave his brother many evidences of regard, appointing him to honorary offices near his person, although he took care that they were such that they conferred but little power.

This was a new source of grievance to the haughty Countess, who never relinquished the idea of becoming a queen, and had fondly imagined that, on account of Philip's youth, his brother would obtain such a strong ascendency over his mind as would make him king in reality, if not in name.

This disappointment was felt with increased bitterness when she became the mother of a son, in whom she centred all her ambitious hopes and all the love she was capable of feeling for any one.

Unlike our modern fine ladies, the dames of high degree of that remote period, were early risers; and the Countess de Neville often took long rides on horseback before the dew was off the grass, unattended, except by her groom, who kept at a respectful distance, just near enough to be within call, should his lady require assistance.

One morning, she paused in front of a little cottage, situated in a perfect wilderness of bloom. As an involuntary ejaculation of surprise and admiration escaped her lips, a pretty, intelligent-looking girl raised her bright eyes from the rose-bush she was pruning.

"I have some handsomer within, arranged in bouquets," she said, smiling, "if Madame would like to examine them."

Throwing the reins of her horse to her attendant, the Countess alighted, much to the surprise of the servitor, who had never known his haughty mistress to be guilty of so much condescension before.

As the Countess entered the little low room, the pretty flower-girl displayed her beautiful collection of bouquets with pardonable pride.

"All or any of them are at your service, with the exception of this," she said, pointing to one composed of golden lilies and white roses, and relieved by a few leaves of green; "it is for the King."

"So King Philip buys the flowers, pretty maiden?"

"Yes. Madame; I have orders to bring them to the palace daily. The golden lily is his favorite flower; and there are only those in bloom to-day."

"I will take this," said the Countess, selecting one of the bouquets, and taking from her purse a gold piece of more than double the value, "but first bring me a cool draught of water from the spring yonder."

With a light step the young girl took a pitcher and passed out to the spring that was but a short distance from the door. As she glided by the window on returning, she glanced in and saw, much to her surprise, her visitor bending over the stand of flowers, and apparently sprinkling something from her hand upon those she laid aside for the King. When she took it away, her eye caught a gleam of a small golden flask, such as the ladies of that period used for their cosmetics and perfumery. But when she entered the room, she found her in the position in which she had left her.

She could not forbear an exclamation of surprise as she observed how deadly pale was her countenance.

"'Tis but the odor of the flowers," said the Countess, as, drawing her robes around her, she turned to the door. "Take my advice, my good girl; place the stand nearer the window, and be not much over them: their perfume is quite too strong for so small a room."

There was something about these words, carelessly spoken though they were, that deepened the undefined suspicious in the young girl's heart; and, following her suggestion, she placed the stand of flowers directly in front of the open window. Then, by a close examination of the bouquet destined for the King, she detected the presence of a fine white powder, impalpable to the eye, upon the white petals of the rose, but clearly visible upon the lilies, whose peculiar shape, by exposing the leaves to the full rays of the sun, as well as their vivid coloring, threw it into strong relief; and as she bent over them, the faint but penetrating odor that arose made her so giddy that she would have fallen, had it not been for the tall, shapely youth who had just entered, and whose livery showed him to be in the service of the King.

It was her lover, Francois, King Philip's body-servant, and who, passing by the house, called to have a chat with his betrothed.

"How now, Marie?" he said, looking into her face. "What has frightened the roses from your cheek, and given you a strange look?"

The honest-hearted fellow was sincerely attached to his royal master, and he listened gravely to Marie's account of the strange conduct of her visitor, and the suspicions to which it gave rise.

"It is a bad look," he said, thoughtfully; "though I believe there is nothing in it. By good luck, I have orders to attend his Majesty in his private apartments an hour hence. I will put him on his guard; then surely no harm can come of it."

Somewhat to the surprise of Francois, the King manifested no disquietude at this disclosure, though the grave look and attentive manner with which he listened, showed that he considered it of no light import. He bade him charge Marie to tell no one what she had discovered, but to come to the palace with her flowers an hour earlier than was her wont, by no means forgetting her golden lilies.

King Philip sat in his audience-hall, surrounded by his retinue. A number of the royal family stood near him—among them the Counte de Neville. his wife, and the little son, a sweet boy of three, whose winning and sprightly ways made him a favorite with the King.

"And please your Majesty, Marie, the flower girl, is awaiting without," said one of the guard.

"Admit her," said the King.

Marie had never seen King Philip in his robes of state, and the royal pomp that surrounded him impressed her with a feeling of awe as she entered. But this was quickly dissipated by the King's gracious manner, as he bade her approach.

"I see you have not forgotten my favorite flower," he said, taking the basket from her hand. "Just admire these queenly lilies, fair Countess, and inhale the fragrance from the roses."

"But why do you start and turn pale?" he added, as with an involuntary shudder she drew back from the flowers he would have placed in her hand.

"I—I crave your Majesty's pardon," she stammered, "but the odor of the roses affects me thus."

The King's eyes followed the Countess as she retreated to the window, at the further end of the hall, under the pretext of obtaining air. He then fixed them searchingly on her husband's face, whose mind seemed to be entirely occupied by the laughing boy he held in his arms.

Attracted by the bright color of the lilies, the child stretched out its hands for them. A sudden thought struck the King as he observed this.

"See how eagerly Louis is regarding them!" he said, turning to the Count. "Let him have them."

With a fond smile the father took the flowers and held them before the boy, who, catching them with both his dimpled hands, raised them with a gleeful shout to his lips.

Instantly, a deadly pallor overspread his face, and with a faint gasp he fell dead in his father's arms!

The Countess had kept a furtive watch on the King's movements from her retreat, and forgetting everything in her terror, sprang forward to arrest her husband's arm.

"Monster!" she exclaimed, glaring upon him like a tigress robbed of her young; "you have destroyed your own child!"

"And you," said Philip, pointing significantly to the flowers, still clasped in the child's rigid fingers, "you would have murdered your King!"

"Is this the woman that called at your cottage this morning?" he inquired, turning to Marie.

"The same, your Majesty."

As soon as the Count comprehended the full meaning of these words, he cast a look of horror and detestation upon his wife, then taking his dead boy, he laid him on the pile of cushions at the King's feet.

"I can lay before you no stronger proof, Sire," he faltered, "that I was ignorant of the existence of this base plot against your life."

As Philip looked upon the still, sweet features of the child, and then upon his father, his eyes softened.

"You are right. God knows that I would fain have spared your loyalty such a severe test."

"I wish you all to bear witness," he said, addressing those around him, "that I fully exonerate Count de Neville from all complicity with his wife in this attempt upon the life of your King."

"As to you," he added, turning to the guilty woman, "I give you twenty days to leave the kingdom. If after that time you are found in my dominions, you shall suffer the full penalty of your crime."

King Philip did not forget the debt of gratitude he owed to Marie and his faithful attendant. He was present at the marriage, which occurred a few days after, bestowing a dowry on the bride, and other substantial marks of favor; and ever afterward, in commemoration of his providential deliverance, he bore upon his shield the "Golden Lily."

On a cold, stormy night lately, two representatives of the press were struggling homeward through the storm with close-buttoned coats and "hearts of controversy," discussing things wise and otherwise, when their steps were arrested by a feeble cry from their side of—"Please, sir, only a few cents." Looking down at his side the man of ink saw a little wretch, whose ragged garments afforded but little protection from the pitiless storm, shivering along the pavement, and looking up to him with woe-begone countenance. The whole story was photographed in an instant on the quick imagination of the "member of the press." The drunken father; the sick mother, and the little starving child endeavoring to beg a few pennies to carry to his miserable home. Hastily putting his hand into his pocket—scantily lined, as usual with the profession—he thrust something into the little palm, which closed eagerly on it and disappeared with its owner into the darkness. With a warmer heart he turned to his companion and commenced—when he was interrupted by a sharp, childish treble, which pierced the fog and night like a knife: "S-a-a-y! Jimmee! Derned if I ain't stuck a flat; less go'n get er stew."

"Count that day lost whose low declining sun—"

Romance of the Last Cold Snap.—The Chicago Tribune tells a story of the recent cold snap that has a tinge of romance. A pair of youthful lovers from Indiana ran away from home during the absence of the girl's father, and went to Chicago to get married. The father happened to be in Chicago at the time, and got on the track of the fugitives, they escaping by one door of a hotel while he came in at the other. The pair got a sleigh and started off on the prairie toward Downer's Grove, where they intended to find shelter and a clergyman before the "old man" could reach them. On the way the intense cold froze the pair into insensibility. They were rescued by the inmate of a house by the wayside, and a doctor summoned. From an expression dropped by the young man while in a state of semi-consciousness, the rescuers concluded the pair were man and wife, and placed them in one bed, the doctor enjoining strict quiet and a total abstinence from conversation. Next morning the enraged father of the girl tracked the fugitives to the house, and a "scene" ensued, in which rage, horror, and confusion were blended. The result was, however, that a clergyman was sent for, and that a marriage took place immediately.

Ladies are still exercised about an efficient style of skirt looping. They seem not to realize that a very wide skirt can not be looped gracefully over a narrow one, the points formed by the looping being necessarily long and abrupt. Neither can it be festooned with good effect over a wide skirt, as the folds would then fall together and look clumsy and heavy. Indeed, no width of bottom skirt will relieve the difficulty, and sooner or later the ladies here, like their cousins across the water, will have to resort to dresses of fewer breadths, looped permanently over a rather short petticoat. And this must be devoted to promenading, and the costly silks, with their magnificent trains, kept exclusively for drawing-room wear, not for the crowded drawing-room, where they are as mal apropos, almost, as on the street.—Boudoir.

Among the most charming of the new suits that appeared on the streets this spring, was one in bright blue silk. There was nothing new in the basque, which was cut in the "Marie" form, with revers breasts, coat sleeves, and deep pockets; but the tout ensemble was recherché and fresh as possible. The dress was cut in Princesse form, with a very slight train; the bottom of the skirt was trimmed with two-inch wide gray plush, as were the edges of the jacket; the pockets were trimmed with inch-wide plush; the cuffs and epaulettes consisted of bands of plush two inches wide. The bonnet worn with this was of white drawn silk with white plume, loops of blue ribbon behind, blue silk bandeau in front, ornamented with gold stars and forget-me-nots.—Boudoir.

A CHARACTERISTIC SPEECH.

The following is reported as the speech of E. J. Chase, of San Francisco, delivered upon taking the chair of Speaker of the California Assembly on Monday evening, April 2, 1866. Picking up the Speaker's mallet in one hand and the presentation watch in the other, Chase spoke as follows:

Feller Members: This elegant present reminds us, as the hour draws nigh when this band of thieves must disperse, that we must watch and pray. You have watched the Speaker and preyed on the public treasury. I am no orator like Bill Hunt of Sacramento, nor have I the musical voice of Hunt of Santa Clara. The Third House will keep quiet, or I'll order Sergeant-at-arms Ben Dore to show you the door and inject you from the portals [A Voice—"Port-holes, Mr. Speaker"] of the Capitol. In exercising the functions of Speaker, I will strictly adhere to Jefferson's Emanuel. [Here a shower of books—Adjutant General's, agricultural, and Swett's school reports, with Horace Hawes' Registry and Hager's School bills, rained down upon the Speaker.] Order, gentlemen, or I will declare this ere Assembly adjourned sine diney.

A Voice—Mr. Speaker, does that last remark apply to the member from ——, who dines at lunch tables and washes his own socks? [Before a reply could be made, a porter came staggering up the aisle with some two hundred weight of documents, which was announced as the report of the Committee on Federal Relations.]

The Speaker—To conclude, gentlemen, I have not bored you with long or loud speeches—I have left that to my coadjutor, Wiggins of San Francisco, author of the Seduction bill. [Here the member from Mariposa poised a bulky Assembly Journal, aiming it at the Speaker's head.] John Wilcox, take your seat; I will allow no member to assume as ballo jiggerent an attitude. You have clubbed together and caned old Holden and Judge Brown with some fine silverware, and I would advise the Judge to keep his eyes on the spoons, but he'd orter know the crowd he's in. [Here came a big book by the side of the Speaker's head, from the direction of Alameda.] You, Tom Eager, do that again and I'll send this ere gravel [A Voice—Gavel, Mr. Speaker] at your head. [Here came another shower of documentary missiles, which the Speaker returned with vollies from the Federal Relations reports until exhausted, when the Honorable Jake closed with these remarks:] Speaker Yule will please to take this ere chair, for I'd rather be a clam butcher in h—ll than to preside over this ere Assembly. After the adjournment I will go back to my constituents—a decent and orderly crowd—and once more preside in Washington Market. Gentlemen, in the language of a Western poet, I will abskize.—Union.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

CHARLES HENRY WEBB, EDITOR.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1866.

THE LATE CALAMITY.

THE moral effect of the calamity of the 16th inst., seems fair to outlast the physical evidences of its awful power. The grave has closed over the bodies of its victims; its ruins on the corner of Montgomery and California streets are almost cleared away, and yet it is still the theme of sorrowful wonder. It would seem that this sudden and instantaneous catastrophe occurring in the heart of a business community, and in the apparent security which invests the counting-house, had left a peculiar impression on a mercurial people who have been too easily forgetful of earthquake shock, flood, and conflagration.

The extent of the disaster was slight in comparison with what might have been the result of carelessness or unconscious trifling with that terrible compound during its transmission to San Francisco, or with the aggravated and complicated evil which might have followed its explosion in more confined limits. Had the explosion taken place on ship-board, the saving of a single life would have been miraculous; we should have been spared the sickening details of the accident, for the reason that none would have been left to tell this story of criminal negligence or cowardly scheming. Had the examination taken place in the principal office or on steamer day, when the building is crowded with people, imagination shrinks from speculating the extent of the devastation.

Humanity and justice demand the fullest investigation of the facts. Until the inquest is over, when it is expected that complete exposition of the cause will be given, we can only look at the effect. We can only point the general moral of the uncertainty of human life, and bear witness to the tremendous and inexplicable forces which lie dormant in our midst, and which the single blow of a careless hand may rouse into terrible activity.

The excitement and bewilderment which follow such shocks are often productive of illogical reasoning and reckless legislation. Our Board of Supervisors have given a notable instance of the correctness of this remark. The famous mandate to Chief Burke, to enter the dwellings and destroy the private property of citizens, and the resolution to telegraph to New York to request shippers not to send any more nitro-glycerine to San Francisco, are fair specimens of the legislation born of such a crisis, and will go into history with the solemnly-ridiculous order of the frightened Flemish burgomaster of ancient chronicle. No less ludicrous, though equally natural, is the personal animosity which people of good intentions, but defective logic, have exhibited towards this new compound—nitro-glycerine. If we mistake not, much of this argument is familiar, and has already been used against gunpowder, steam, electricity, and most of the inventions and discoveries of present and past ages. That the qualities of nitro-glycerine are not yet fully understood, or that this compound has already been baptized in the blood of the brother of its inventor, is no proof that man is not superior to his chemistry, or that science cannot eventually conquer, restrain, and utilize even this powerful combination. Electricity is more powerful than nitro-glycerine. To tamper with the lightning of heaven was but a few years ago considered reckless and impious, and yet, as man's willing and tireless slave, it last week carried across the continent the terrible proofs of the power of this newly-discovered explosive agent.

Our readers will welcome the reappearance in these columns of "Dennar Steuart"—one of The Californian's first contributors. From far Illinois these messages come. The tender and touching lines in the present number are commemorative of a dear and only brother, who, in the terrible fight in the Wilderness, fell bravely at the head of his company, having snatched a musket from the hand of a soldier who was killed, himself leading the charge in the double capacity of officer and private.

Among the victims of the late catastrophe was Garret W. Bell. The city mourns, in the loss of this gentleman, an upright and honest municipal counsellor; Society an affable and courteous gentleman; Literature and the Arts a discriminating and generous patron; Benevolence an open hand and kindly heart; and his family that domestic example and devotion which cannot be replaced.

"Myth," whose trip to Mount Diablo is reported in a style of vigor and originality which cannot fail to create a desire that he will "come again and often," has pushed aside a number of editorials which were in head if not in hand when he made his appearance.

Mr. Charles Henry Webb left this city, by the steamer of the 18th instant, on a brief visit to the East.

[For the Californian.]

TO THE SUMMIT OF MONTE DEL DIABLO.

PREFATORY.

EVER since Mr. and Mrs. Adam first took their meagre lunch of apples, when picnicing in the Garden of Eden, a love of the supernatural, a desire to inquire into the mysteries beyond our mundane sphere, to ferret out the secrets of both Heaven and Hell, has possessed man, as well as woman kind.

As I am a chronicler of truth, I am forced, with regret, to express my conviction that, to the world at large, Hell is a more popular study than Heaven. I arrive at this conclusion when I observe the great number who daily secure through tickets by the "broad" route. Passage by the "narrow" gauge, although sure in the end, is sought by but few.

A very slight smell of brimstone and a peep at the cloven foot, if unaccompanied by danger, is not undesirable to most of us.

Perhaps it was a desire somewhat akin to this, added to a love of the beautiful in nature, and a wish to escape from the glaring walls and dusty streets of San Francisco, that prompted a party, consisting of a gentleman connected with the daily press of San Francisco; a city official, not so low in rank as his name would imply, and your correspondent, who is —— well; no matter what: to you he may be known as ..myth, to start on an excursion to the peak of the Devil's Mount, one day last week.

Monte del Diablo, being daily visible to all San Franciscans, it is needless for me to go on, like the geographers, and give its location; but enough to say, that its significant name naturally led us to expect a sniff of sulphur, if nothing more, from his Satanic Majesty's Domains.

WE START.

Taking the Sacramento boat, Capital, whose name expresses her qualities—I am sure no one ever thought of that double entendre before—we were landed safely at Benicia, known as Francisca until the sage inhabitants, fearing their city might be confounded with the village at the Golden Gate, wisely changed the name.

A PERILOUS SEA VOYAGE.

Without loss of time, we boarded the model craft known as the Martinez Ferry, and, as the shades of night were falling fast, crossed the dark and stormy waters of the Straits of Carquinez. As we approached the town of Martinez, the Captain of the gallant ship, who officiated at the wheel, commanded all hands aloft to look out for the landing.

SKILFUL NAVIGATORS.

"All hands"—consisting solely and entirely of the man who collected the fare—by means of a dry goods box, conveniently arranged, fearlessly mounted the poop deck, and, without the aid of sextant, took the bearings so accurately, that in three minutes we collided with the town of Martinez, with only such gentle force as to cause the inhabitants of that burgh to rush forth into the streets, expecting to see the walls of their mansions fall from the effects of the terrible earthquake.

The Captain was so elated with this little piece of pleasantry on his part, that he would not permit us to land, but instructed "all hands," who was rushing about promiscuously, wild with delight, to "heave off!"

"All hands" "heaved" in masterly style; the elegant piece of naval architecture gracefully withdrew from astonished Martinez: but only to return. "All hands" was again sent aloft; another observation was taken, and again, with impetuous speed, our noble ship rushed down upon the seemingly doomed city: but by the dextrous skill of the helmsman, we avoided running down the Temple of Justice that rears its proud columns from the foundation rocks of Martinez: the Captain remarking that he didn't wish to "do it brown"—another piece of pleasantry: Brown being the name of the high judicial functionary at that moment presiding at a breach of promise trial: promises being more honored in the breach than in the observance in Martinez as well as in the Bay City.

MARTINEZ FINDS A CURTIUS.

The Captain, still unsatisfied with this extraordinary display of nautical skill, again forbade our landing; again "all hands" nobly heaved; again our brave ship withdrew from the doomed (mem. to printer: Be exceedingly careful not to spell that last word with an "a") place; again, like a swift courser, did we charge down on the ill-fortuned city; when lo! her savior appeared upon the wharf in the person of the enraged Jehu of the Pacheco coach, who, exasperated by this delay, recklessly snatched a line with which a small boy was at that moment catching crabs, and regardless of the danger to himself, cast the hook aboard, and with the assistance of the small boy before referred to, drew us in and secured us to the wharf, notwithstanding the fumings of the Captain and the "heavings" and "blarsting his tarry toplights" of "all hands."

I must, however, do the Captain the justice to say that he did not so far lose his temper as to charge a cent extra for this magnificent display of seamanship.

ON TO PACHECO.

Fearful that the anger of the outraged citizens of Martinez might be visited upon us, we immediately mounted the coach in waiting, and whipping up, arrived at Pacheco, a distance of nearly six miles, in less than forty-five minutes.

Although it was now nine o'clock and dark, we concluded to take saddle-horses and push on immediately to Clayton, eight miles beyond, and at the foot of the mountain.

DE TROP.

While our horses were being saddled, I was the unintentional listener to a side conversation between Mr. Johnson, the proprietor of the stable, and Jehu.

Johnson (loquitor)—"Who are these fellows? Can we trust them with the horses?"

Jehu—"Don't know! They're coves from the city. Guess they're after coal or copper. That fellow with the specs (the editor) may be a clock pedlar; but I guess he's safe. The others look honest enough; the big one especially." (Meaning "yours truly." I hope the Bank of California will make a memorandum of this and give me credit accordingly.)

OUR HORSES.

Mr. Johnson seemed satisfied, for the horses were brought out in a moment; Mr. Johnson remarking that the largest man would have to take the roughest horse.

I, being the proprietor of 200 avoirdupois—to say nothing of small responsibilities at home—immediately assumed, as much as possible, an air of fairy proportions. But 'twas of no avail; for Mr. Johnson, turning to me, said: "I guess you'll have to take the bay!"

The bay, however, turned out to be the best nag of the three, and Mr. Johnson is hereby notified to reserve "Billy" for me on future excursions.

A NIGHT GALLOP.

Mounting, out we dashed into the darkness, giving our horses their heads and trusting entirely to them to find the way.

After going what we supposed to be about eight miles, we saw a light in the distance, which we took to be Clayton, and in our endeavor to reach it nearly rode over the town, which we found enshrouded in darkness and silence—so much so, in fact, that we were in doubt as to whether it really was Clayton.

On our left was the ghostly outline of a building, and beside it stood a post fashioned like a gibbet, from which swung an old style country-inn sign. Not a light was visible, except a smouldering log in the distance, and not a sound was heard except the gurgling of a little rivulet not far off, and the croaking of the frogs.

MINE HOST.

The editor, dismounting, gave several lusty raps on the door with his riding-whip, and, after what to us seemed an interminable period, a light appeared, and with it mine host "Mauvais" of the "Fire Proof Hotel," who by the way, is not such a bad hotel-keeper as his name would lead one to infer. He seemed somewhat surprised at seeing us at that hour of the night; but informed us that the place was Clayton, and that he could take us in for the night.

"JUDGE MORRIS."

Seeing that we were mounted, he told us to go across the street, and sing out "Judge Morris!" and said the "Judge" would come out and put up our horses.

As directed, we hallooed for the Judge; but he didn't come: so the editor jumped over the fence and plunged through the Judge's cabbage-garden to his house, and after some delay persuaded him that we were not burglars and did not intend to commit murder.

When he got to the stables, where we had preceded him, guardedly grasping the arm of the city official, and standing at a respectful distance, he asked:

"My friends! Who are you and where are you from at this hour?"

"We are belated travellers from the city and wish to put up our horses for the night."

To which the Judge, with a confidential and encouraging pat on the back of the official, replied:

"Ah, yes! I know you now!"

Although I verily believe the Judge was fibbing—for none of us had ever seen him before—it was very encouraging to find one who said he knew us and would go our sponsor.

So the Judge called up one of his men, and, requesting that our horses be ready for us at six in the morning, we bade him good night and in a few minutes were comfortably lodged: my official friend complaining in the morning, however, that he had nothing but a chair to put his lamp on. This was peculiarly "rough" (excuse the phrase) on him, as he is not accustomed to hide his light under a basket.

CLAYTON.

In the morning, we found Clayton to be lovely little village nestled in among the hills, with the purple peaks of Mount Diablo looming up on the south. Grand old oaks, with other forest trees, are scattered around unsparingly; and, not a stone's throw from the hotel, runs, over its pebbly bed, a little brook of deliciously clear, cool water. In the village are stores, blacksmith's and carpenter's shops, express and post office, and an extensive brewery.

After breakfast and a surreptitious reconnoissance of Judge Morris' cabbage-patch, to ascertain the amount of damage done by our editorial friend, we mounted and cantered off for the Summit, distant about six miles.

UP THE VALLEY.

Winding up through the valley, between lovely hills that increased in height as we advanced; following the course of the babbling brook before referred to; with overhanging foliage of every tint brushing against us on either side; dashing through the bed of the stream an infinitude of times; in the fresh morning air; the birds making music all around—all was bright and beautiful. Exclamations of delight burst from us at every moment. Each step presented new beauties. As we advanced, we found the hillsides perforated in every direction with tunnels, excavated by parties in search of copper or coal.

Along this beautiful avenue our horses sped at an exhilarating pace, occasionally snatching a tempting mouthful from the luxuriant foliage, and evidently enjoying the beauties around, as much as their riders.

And thus we continued on, up through the valley, ascending very gradually, for about four miles, when we came to a little house by the roadside, built of logs; the crevices filled in with clay, reminding one of the log cabins of Kentucky and Tennessee.

A WET BLANKET.

The proprietor, a somewhat elderly man, with a full, long beard, and frame for an Hercules, stood near the door, attempting to whittle out something with a dull table knife, which he held awkwardly in his left hand, on account of which I immediately set him down as from outside of Yankee-land.

We asked him if we would have any difficulty in keeping the right trail to the summit. He gave us the not eucouraging reply, that not one out of ten ever found the way to the top without a guide, and commiserated us on not having taken one with us. We concluded from his manner that he was not unwilling to earn a fee as our guide, and therefore was not disinterested. So, asking a few more questions as to the route, we bade him good morning and spurred on.

The trail, which until this time had been wide enough for a carriage, and had ascended so gradually as to be scarcely perceptible, now narrowed down into a simple foothpath, with scarcely room for a horse to turn, running along the steep hillside and rising rapidly: our horses settling down into a walk, and stopping every few rods to take breath.

ALMOST A TURN OVER.

At one of these rests, my horse suddenly took it into his head that we were going in the wrong direction, and, quicker than a flash, turned down hill. How he turned without precipitating himself and rider down the declivity, I cannot imagine. Fortunately, I was in the rear, and thus nothing prevented me from riding some distance back to a wide place in the path, and facing up hill again.

THE SCENERY

now began to assume an aspect of grandeur. Looking back through the gorge, up which we had been climbing, we had, through the opening, a distant view of Sui-sun bay, and the hills beyond Benicia bathed in Spring verdure. The path now became steeper at every step. We did not become conscious of the labor to which our horses were subjected until, dismounting, we attempted to walk a short distance, but were glad to stop, puffing and blowing, after advancing a few rods.

LOVELY SITE FOR A HOMESTEAD.

About a mile from the house last mentioned, we came to a plateau in the mountain side, called Deer Flat, at which spot, beside a glorious spring of cool, clear water, that would put to shame the mixture we drink in San Francisco, stands the house of a Mexican, surmounted by fields of waving grain, and beautiful flowers of every hue and tint, and sending forth delicious fragrance.

OFF THE TRAIL.

Here the trail suddenly stopped. The Mexican, on whom we had relied to direct us from this point, was not at home. We were in a dilemma, and immediately formed ourselves into a committee of the whole, to inquire into the prospect of reaching the summit.

After taking the bearings of the different peaks in view, with but one dissenting vote we concluded which was the highest, and immediately started off in the direction that we thought would lead us to it. Fortunately, we soon which was very distinct and clear after that to the very top. As we advanced to what we considered the highest peak, another would appear beyond still higher. We were thus deceived several times, but, by winding arouud, we were not compelled to descend much into the valleys.

We had left the woods far behind. The trail now led through a dense growth of chaparral, about the height of a man.

At last, at ten o'clock, after a ride of two and a half hours, we found ourselves the very peak, from which the high mountains we had just climbed looked like mere mole-hills.

AT THE SUMMIT,

THE VIEW

that now burst upon us was grand in the extreme. Securing our horses in the chaparral, and seating ourselves on the pile of rocks that crown the peak, with greedy eyes we drank in the glorious picture spread out beneath our feet.

Valleys, more beautiful than the Happy Valley of Rasselas, are scattered here and there, with meandering streams and picturesque villages. Far off into the distance stretched the winding waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin with their flat tule lands. Away to the north loomed up the bleak head of Mount Shasta, with the Marysville Buttes for a foreground. On the southwest rose up the purple sides of the Santa Cruz range; while on the east, merging into earth and air, the Sierra Nevada lifted their proud heads.

Goat Island, bathed in our beautiful bay, seemed at our feet, and the blue waters of the broad Pacific reached forth into space, hardly distinguishable from the clear sky above. Sacramento, Stockton, and the unromantic streets of San Francisco, were discernable to the naked eye.

Here and there, far below us in the valleys, floated pure white clouds. We were so fortunate as to witness the formation of some of them. As the warm air, laden with moisture, arose from the valleys, it met the cool west wind which now began to blow, and the moisture was immediately condensed into fine white mist. The change was as if by magic. Between us and the landscape at which we might be gazing, would suddenly form dense white clouds, cutting off our view until the wind had wafted them away. Some, driven by the wind towards us, would be dissipated by the cold sides of the mountain and entirely disappear; the moisture being still further condensed and bathing the mountain in gentle dew.

TAKING OBSERVATIONS.

The editor, who had been elected unanimously commissary to the expedition, at this juncture produced a mysterious-looking instrument composed of glass, silver, and leather; which he called a "spirit level," and as he seemed familiar with its use, I believed him. Turning to my official friend, he commissioned him to compose a couplet suitable to the occasion. After forty-three minutes and seventeen seconds severe brain work, he triumphantly produced the following:

"May such nectar often flow
On this Monte Diablo!"

which was received with tumultuous applause, amid which we severally and individually manipulated the instrument referred to; which immediately became quite popular—especially with my editorial companion, who seemed best to understand and appreciate its use and benefits.

SINGULAR FREAK OF NATURE.

Wishing to leave some memento of our visit, we went to work and in a few minutes piled up a pyramidal heap of stones to the height of four or five feet. I have since learned that a distinguished professor, now publishing a work on the Geology of California, who happened at that moment to be looking through a powerful telescope at the mountain—watching for earthquakes—made this astounding entry in his diary:

"April 14th 1866.—While observing Mount Diablo this morning, at exactly 10:45 A.M., the entire body of the mountain rose gradually, for ten or twelve minutes, until the altitude was increased several feet; subsequent measurement by instruments made it five feet three and a half inches. No satisfactory explanation is as yet given for this remarkable phenomenon. It was probably caused by one of the great upheavals of nature at work on this planet; but it is somewhat singular that no accompanying shock was felt in this city."

I hope that when this meets the eye of that Professor, he will expunge so much of the entry quoted, as refers to the cause of the "phenomenon."

A WAIF.

Roaming around the rocks—which on one side form a precipice several hundred feet down—I espied a lady's glove. The poet of the party addressed all manner of sweet and touching apostrophes to it, and attempted to insinuate that I had "got a mitten"—which I emphatically denied. The fair owner is hereby informed that she can have the glove "on proving property and" without "paying for this advertisement." I shall claim the right, however, to make such sundry little charges as I may find convenient, provided she is young and pretty—as no doubt she is.

The rhyming official had invited some of his lady friends to be on Mission-street wharf, to behold us in our perilous ascent. As I love to tell the truth, I am compelled to say that we did not see them. I hope they saw us—otherwise many graceful attitudes were lost.

Two lovely little lakelets, on a plateau five or six hundred feet below the summit, invited us to a bath—but time forbade.

Just as we had mounted and began to descend the mountain, a party of two gentlemen and two ladies rode up—seemingly in excellent spirits. We regretted that we had no plausible excuse for returning; so we rapidly descended, stopping at the spring near the Mexican's hut to partake of a lunch; and retracing our steps arrived in San Francisco without accident that same night, having been absent but thirty hours.

And now a few words as to the best of Mount Diablo. By taking the Suisun boat, which leaves three mornings every week, and connects at Martinez with the coach for Clayton, one can reach the latter place, which is at the foot of the mountain, the same afternoon, and then go to the summit next morning. But to one who does not mind a night gallop, the route we took consumes the least time. Another route is by stage, which leaves Oakland daily for Antioch, via Clayton and the lovely Alamo valley and the romantic Contra Costa hills. As to the EXPENSES.

WAY OF GETTING TO THE SUMMIT

The fare from San Francisco to Benicia, including dinner, is $3.00; ferriage across to Martinez, 25 cents; coach fare to Pacheco, five and a-half miles, 50 cents; horse from Pacheco to summit and return, $3.00; lodging, breakfast and lunch at Clayton, $1.75; stabling over night, $1.00. The round trip, say $13.00—and as much more as one is pleased to spend.

Although there are parties on the mountain nearly every day, from different parts of the State, still I am surprised that greater numbers do not make the trip. And I think, too, that when Clayton is found out, it will become a popular place of resort to those who love quiet and beautiful scenery. It is the nearest point to the mountain, and within a few miles of the copper, coal and cinnabar mines. Good fishing and shooting abound in the immediate vicinity, and the accommodations at the hotel, although not cosmopolitan, are very good.

Hoping these notes may induce you to make the trip, and wishing you may enjoy it as much as I did, I desire to be remembered by you as— MYTH.

WE are pleased to learn that Mr. P. H. Canavan, long and favorably known in the importing trade, will for the future carry on the business in his own name—location of office, 716 Montgomery street. Mr. Canavan has already made himself well and favorably known in our community, and being one of the best of fellows, and selling the best of wines, certainly ought to do one of the best businesses in town. He has our best wishes for his success.

[For the Californian.]

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM.

THE first published account of this beautiful flowering plant was in 1678, describing a kind with flowers of a greenish ash color which was grown in very sandy places. Rumphius, in his Herbarium Amboinense, gives a long and interesting account of this plant. He says that the Chinese value the plant highly and bestow great pains on its culture, and that they grow it in pots and jars, which they set upon their tables when they give entertainments. He adds that it is esteemed a mark of respect to present the finest flower to the most honored guest, and as the extent and value of the compliment is estimated by the size of the flower, he tells us that in order to produce these large flowers, the Chinese gardeners are obliged to check the growth of the plant; for if it is left to itself, it grows tall and rude, and produces little else but leaves—but when its growth is restrained it produces an abundance of flowers. He also tells us that each branch usually produces three blossoms, but that the Chinese pinch off two of these in the bud, which occasions the remaining flowers to increase so much that it is often broader than a man's hand; and that if a plant be suffered to remain more than two years in the same ground it degenerates; for which reason, he continues, the Chinese raise new plants every year.

This description is very curious on account of the details respecting culture, which agree so well with the practice and experience of modern days as to afford another proof of what has been so often observed, that many of what we consider modern improvements are in fact only revivals of the knowledge of our ancestors. The lovers of flowers are unanimous in their admiration of this Chinese exotic. Its claims upon our regard are such that none who desire to prolong the duration of the floral year to the utmost extent will neglect to cultivate some of its varieties. It was originally named chrysanthemum by the Greeks, to whom it would seem the yellow varieties were first known, as it is mentioned by Dioscorides under its present name, or Gold Flower, which can only in strictness he applied to that variety, though all the species are now so denominated, whatever the color of the bloom. Its adaptability to circumstances and situations in which other plants would scarcely survive, renders its cultivation most desirable.

We have seen it occupy positions in yards in the centre of large towns either in large tubs or in the open ground where it has attained a handsome appearance, being completely covered with blooms. As a house-plant it has also many recommendations. Amateurs having small gardens and wishing to keep a succession of flowers will find a few Chrysanthemums very acceptable.

The following hints will be useful to those who wish to grow a specimen plant: Take off a cutting at as early a stage as possible, it should he short-jointed, remove the leaves and eyes or buds from the lower portion, and insert firmly in the soil either in a pot or the open ground; keep the soil moist, and, when fairly rooted and growing, increase the quantity of water to which occasionally a little manure-water will be of great service. The plant should then be re-potted in rich soil and frequently watered; the main shoots should be checked by pinching out the ends; this will induce the growth of lateral shoots. They should be re-potted from time to time as the roots fill the pots, and more frequently watered with manure water. After the plants have attained the desired size and form by pinching out the ends and bending the shoots, it may then be allowed to form the flower-buds. When the buds are forming, all superfluous buds should be removed and all the rigor of the plant directed to forming the flowers. The plant is of a succulent nature and requires a great quantity of fluid nourishment. Manure-water should be used at least twice a week until the flowers are nearly perfected.

If the flowers are shaded they will be much finer in form and color, and last much longer. They are now to he had of all shades of color, size and form, and the catalogues of some of the Chrysanthemum exhibitions embrace hundreds of kinds, any one of which is beautiful and well worth cultivating.

If it were necessary to prove the advantages of a fixed standard for floral subjects, we need only instance the fact "that no real or decided improvements were effected in the science of floriculture until a correct standard of perfection was decided upon, and the properties necessary to constitute that perfection defined upon principles that could easily be understood and reduced to practice." Since this method has been adopted, the improvement in most kinds of flowers have been very marked, the amateur and the florist have endeavored to attain the standard of perfection, and in this way have been made conversant with the requirements of a good flower. Among all the plants on which the hand of improvement has been experimenting, and in which success has crowned the efforts, none have given more striking evidences than the Chrysanthemum. The requisites of a good chrysanthemum are as follows: round in outline and half-round looking at it sideways, in other words, half a ball, double, symmetrical, centre well up and perfect, petals broad, blunt, and thick, color decided, and every petal free from notch. San Francisco, September 5th, 1865.

I desire to make known the fact that I was afflicted with a very bad cough for fifteen years, and, during this time, used everything which I could hear of without getting the better of my disease, until I tried Dr. D. B. Vincent's Cold Preventative or Cough Mixture, which cured me sound and well.

NEWTON MOORE.

This is to certify that my wife has been troubled with indigestion for nearly eighteen months, and, by using one bottle of Dr. Vincent's medicine, has been completely cured.

San Francisco, April 6th, 1866.

JOHNSON J. THOMAS.

San Francisco, July 17th, 1865.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats, and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much better; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

JOHN O'NEILL, National Hotel.

MARRIAGE IN FRANCE.

FRENCH marriage ought to interest us from its novelty; it is so entirely different from evnrything with which we are familiar. The interested marriages in America are accompanied with love at least on one side. The heiress loves the fortune-hunter to whom she gives her hand; the maiden is loved by the rich man who purchases her consent. In America it never is a cold commercial bargain; it is always leavened with love.

It is absolntely different here. People contribnte lace, cashmere shawls, horses, houses, carriages, public securities, railway bonds, promissory notes — everything bnt love, to marriage. Nobody ever thinks of inqniring on the subject of love. The investigations made begin and end with the real and personal estate. Acqnaintance itself is disregarded if the real and personal estate are satisfactory. They think here the parties have all their life before them to become acquainted. As notaries occupy in business very much the same position that priests do in religion, being the business confessors of everybody, most marriages are negotiated by the notaries. You have a marriageable daughter. Yon go to him and tell him you wish a husband. You say what you will give her on her marriage, what linen she has, (a wife is commonly expected to bring her husband linen enough to last a lifetime) and what money she will receive on your death. You further inform him what money you require from her husband, and the form of contract you wish: shall the wife's whole estate be secnred to her, or shall the husband's and wife's estate go the snrvivor, or shall they hold both estates in common? The notary examines his clients to see if any of them have a son likely to suit yonr conditions. If he has none, he makes inqniries of other notaries until at last Cœlebs is discovered. He is introduced to the father-in-law in futoro—if he suits, he is soon introduced to the daughter; in a fortnight they are married. You see it is entirely a matter of dollars and cents. The heart has no vote in the debate. Can you wonder that so many husbands and wives are separated, and that conjugal infidelity is so common here?

This abominable system and the passion for display which now fevers all classes in France are ruining the women of this country. I detect a sensible change in the women here during my residence. They are colder, more heartless, physically weaker than they were twenty years ago. I thought it might be mere fancy on my part, but the investigations on the subject which I have made show that the medical profession are unanimously agreed on this subject. They declare the French women are degenerating. They are losing the feminine character entirely. They are becoming nervous creatnres to whom excitement is indispensable, and who consequently loathe everything like domestic life and quiet.

Women in this country take a much more active part in the husband's affairs than they do with you. This is one reason why French trade is so inferior. A woman cannot be taught business. Their superficial minds are arrested by the trifles of trade and cannot penetrate its essence. Observe widows who manage their departed husbands' estate; is it possible to introduce greater stupidity and obstinacy into transactions? This active part in the husband's business still further nnsexes French women. Were these various causes not at work how could you explain the conduct of the woman of twenty-one years old—quite a girl yet in age—I am about to place before you. She is not an exception. Do you remember the story of Mlle. Caillard, of Mlle. Ruffin, who caused the suicide of poor Mons. F. Tandou, and of twenty other young girls which I have related here? And I am far from telling all I know. I attempt to give as much variety as possible to these letters. I shrink from particulars which are unsuited with the columns of a family paper. These reasons lead me to forbear exhibiting to you French feminine depravity at full length, although the subject is interesting and profitable. It is interesting to see the changes of manners and customs of a nation; it is profitable to observe how a nation falls into a decline.

The son of poor peasants in one of the southwestern counties of France contrived by his merits and good fortune to rise to the position of a clerk of the Bank of France, with a salary of five hundred dollars, which would increase annually until he was entitled to a snug retiring pension. It was a fortune to a man of his humble origin. Of course he could not let well enough alone—wasn't he a descendant of Eve? He must needs marry. Lord Chesterfield's wise observation had never reached his ears: "It is better to be in no company at all than to be in bad company." The opinion of most men and all women is quite the contrary. They are persuaded that it is better to be in bad company than no company at all.

The bank clerk sought for a wife. As he had no acqnaintances in Paris, he applied to a matrimonial agency to secure the desired companion. The agent introduced him to a pleasing young lady, the daughter of the wife of a provincial notary, who had quitted her husband some fifteen years before bringing up her daughter to Paris with her. It seems to me when I read the legal advertisements published here, that French men and women marry only to separate. In ten legal advertisements seven of them style the wife as separated from her husband. The marriage was agreed. At this moment the agent claimed payment of the three hundred dollars fee. The clerk hesitated or refused to pay the fee; at all events he angered the agent and the latter tried to break off the match. Leave vengeance to Heaven! 'T will right us better than we can possibly do! The married life of the clerk avenged the wrongs of the agent, for the latter tried in vain to prevent the marriage. They were married. The bride had an income of four hundred dollars a year; he had five hundred dollars. A month had scarcely passed away before the wife felt an nnconqnerable aversion from her husband. She complained they had not money enough. He obtained employment from petty shopkeepers, and from seven to eleven o'clock he labored in their back-shops, writing up their books, in order to increase the household income. Aversion became hatred. He was called miser, brute, who refused his wife everything. She had her girl's bed brought from her mother's house, and refused to sleep with him. Many a day his wife kept away entirely from his house. The first New Year's Day after their marriage she quitted him before he woke, and she did not return until eleven o'clock at night—and New Year's Day is devoted to family gatherings! One night he returned home and found no signs of his wife. He hastened to his mother-in-law's; she told him:

"Your wife has quitted you for ever. When yon married her you did not know all! She loved another man before she married you, and is with him now!"

This statement seems to have been untrne, although what became of the wife dnring the month which elapsed between her flight and her appearance at her father's provincial residence does not clearly appear. Her father at once came to Paris to see the husband. A sort of family council was held which decided that, though the husband was willing to receive her back, his dignity required she should make some penance for her misconduct. She agreed with her family and voluntarily went to St. Michael's Convent, where the sisters exhorted her daily and led her to frequent prayers and other religious exercises. She remained thirty days in the retreat, during which time she continnally wrote her husband such letters as this:

"I cannot help loving you, for I have wronged you most grievonsly. As Mother St. Ignace says, I am capable of feeling love. The time passed here, though short, has been extremely beneficial to me—more beneficial than you may snppose, for when I leave here I shall leave behind these iron bars my horrible past life, my old folly; and I have recovered my reason, thanks in the first place to Heaven, to the gentleness and goodness of my confessor, and to the zeal of good Mother St. Ignace, who has poured oil upon my wounded soul. I comprehend your hatred for a creature like me, and I think you are right to demand reparation. To-day I give you my heart for life; I bring it to you purer than on our wedding-day; criminal love is no longer there. I am ready to follow you. Something whispers to me that maybe to-morrow you will come to carry me to your home. If you had this generous idea I would accept it with a kiss which of a truth would come from my heart.

"Your lamb, repentant as Magdalen, MARIE."

A fortnight after she sent this letter, the husband took her home. Ten days afterwards she fled his house, leaving on the mantel-piece these lines:

"I lied when I said I loved you, because I was under duress when I wrote; I wanted to recover my liberty, and I lied to secure it again. I throw off the mask now."

She at once brought suit to recover her liberty and her dowry.

I am told by lawyers here that the hope of all women who sue for separation (the French statutes do not allow divorce) is that the husband will allow her suit to be decided against him without a struggle. It is a strange, but very common, phenomenon that women care less than men for scandal. To be the snbject of town talk, the target of all eyes, is indifferent to them, if indeed they do not find their vanity gratified by being the heroine of the scandalous chronicle. Lawyers tell me it is an every day occurrence here for husbands to accept in silence condemnation in cases of this sort. It has not been six months since a young man of estate and family married a woman of great beauty. Her family, though respectable, were poor. She brought nothing bnt her person in dowry, for he purchased everything, and gave her besides $20,000 as dowry, that it might appear as if she brought him so much money. She never loved him. Marriage was to her an escape from the thraldom in which the nnmarried of the other sex are kept in this land of vice. Six months after marriage she sued for divorce and forced him to return to her the $20,000 he had given her! She, with this money, set up a young and handsome dry goods shopman she had long fancied, and with whom she now lives as if they were married. There is a woman in Paris who has been married three times. She made all her husbands give her a good deal of money in dowry. She sued for separation from them a year or eighteen months after marriage, contriving during this period of time to make them so wretched as to break life's springs. They respectively died three years after marriage. She is now the widow of three husbands, and, although she commenced life with nothing bnt a pretty face, the mistress of $75,000.

To return to my mutton—if yon will let me call by so tender a name the Fury whose marriage I have related. She made the strangest allegation to sustain her snit. She nrged that her husband had by surprise and fraud thrown her into the convent, where she was treated with the utmost rigor, with the severity of the penitentiaries where the most abandoned women are confined. Stripped of fashionable attire and habited in the coarsest sack cloth, fed on bread and water, locked np at night, obliged to toil all day, and to humiliate herself in the most abject manner to her husband, denied all commerce with the world except with her confessor, her mother (the nnn in whose care she was placed) and her husband. The court soon discovered the mendacity of these allegations, for they were demonstrated to be utterly false, and sentenced the woman to live with her husband. This judgment may seem lenient; bnt if you will remember this creature's desire is to be free, to recover possession of the four hundred dollars revenne she received in dowry, which will enable her to live nntil she wins something better—a pretty woman has not to wish money in Paris to get it—you will see she is loaded with the most chafing fetters.—"Spiridion," in the Boston Gazette.

AMUSEMENTS.

AN original dramatic version of Shirley Brooks' novel, the Silver Cord, was produced at Maguire's Opera House on Monday night, which did not produce a cord of silver for either author or manager—or both combined. The dramatist fell into the general error of endeavoring to follow too closely the lights and shades of the characters and plot of the novel; and thereby made the play too long for the nsual period of performance. The stage manager attacked it ruthlessly with the pruning knife; and, in curtailing, necessarily cut off some of the connecting links of the piece. A series of benefits were announced to commence on the third night after its production, for which each recipient had chosen some favorite play. So that The Silver Cord was born in misfortnne and lived but a span. Mrs. Sophie Edwin as "Mrs. Arthur Lygon," and Mrs. Saunders as "Mrs. Berry"—a character quite out of her line—displayed an ability in their parts and an earnest desire to further the success of the piece, deserving an especial recognition. Thorne, Leman, and Jackson were good.

The Silver Cord was withdrawn on Wednesday night to give place to Buckstone's Flowers of the Forest, on the occasion of Sophie Edwin's benefit. The house was crammed. And we know of no member of the profession more worthy of the substantial compliment thus tendered. Mr. F. B. White presented The Octoroon on Thursday for his benefit—and as an old stager and an invalid he deserved a better one. Last night Mrs. Harry Jackson made her first appearance since her convalescence, as "Julia," in The Hunchback, for the benefit of the "California Tigers."

Monte Christo will be the attraction for the matinée this afternoon, and in the evening Mr. Alfred Saxon will make his first appearance, as "Charles de Moor," in The Robbers. The friends of this gentleman claim that he possesses many of the requisites of an actor, and we hear it is his intention to become a member of the profession. His friends have rallied well to his support, and a good house will await his début.

Manager Maguire announces the positive engagement and coming of Edwin Forrest, and, next week, the Opera House company will remove to the Academy of Music for a temporary season, while the Opera House is undergoing an entire remodelling and rennovating, both before and behind the scenes, in order to be placed in the most favorable condition for the reception of the great star of the American stage. Though California long since gave to the East her favorite Wood, and but yesterday shipped her two Thorns, yet the bounteous East far outstrips her in generosity, and sends in return her towering Forrest. The Opera House company will open at the Academy on Monday night; and on Tuesday evening will produce Watts Phillipps' play, Lost in London, which has had a great run in the English capital, and affords a fine field for both dramatic and scenic effect. Two of the scenes—a snow storm, and the interior of a tin mine in Cornwall—are said to be very effective.

At the Metropolitan, the Sheep's Foot having been trotted off, this theatre has been temporarily closed, and great preparations are being made for the production of De Voe's Irish drama, Ireland Shall Be Free; or, The Patriots of '48. This drama will be produced with the old Arrah-na-Pogue company—Arrah-na-Pogue Brown, Michael Feeney Thompson, Col. O'Grady Pauncefort, etc., and will be brought out on Wednesday night next, if it can be got ready by that time. It is scarcely necessary to add that the piece will be placed on the stage in the most thorough manner, as regards scenery, effects, and costumes.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

CONCORD WAGONS AND HARNESS.—The Pacific Concord Carriage Manufactory is prepared to supply the Pacific Coast with Concord wagons and harness made to order. The members comprising this firm have long been in the employ of the celebrated manufacturing house of L. Downing & Son, Concord, New Hampshire; so that parties wishing Concord wagons or harness can obtain just the same quality of article here and save 25 per cent. on their purchase money. We have seen some of their workmanship, and can recommend it to the public Address Belduke & Co., 820 Folsom street, between Fourth and Fifth.—San Francisco Leader.

DAINTY WORK.—About the daintiest work we ever saw were specimens of hair jewelry at the establishment of Mrs. C. Cook, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, yesterday. This lady manufactures all sorts of jewelry—watch-chains, earrings, finger rings, breastpins, and various other kinds of ornaments—from human hair. We witnessed the process of manufacture, and it is intricate and ingenious in the highest degree.—S. F. Examiner.

WANTED—Agents to sell, by subscription only the most popular work ever written: "GRANT AND SHERMAN; their Campaigns and Generals." By the world-renowned historian, Hon. J. T. Headley, author of Washington and his Generals, Sacred Mountains, etc. Agents are taking as high as thirty subscribers per day, and all agree in pronouncing it the most saleable work they ever took hold of. The people want Headley's illustrated "GRANT AND SHERMAN," etc. For terms and territory, address E. E. SHEAR, No. 8 Montgomery Street, and Box 1,430, San Francisco, California.

BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES.—If you want a trim neat, light, and yet durable style of buggy or carriage, go to Nos. 37 and 39 Webb street, between Sacramento and California, where you will find just such a vehicle as will suit your taste. POLLARD & CARVILL not only deal in these articles, but manufacture them to order, and do repairing, painting, trimming and blacksmithing with dispatch and neatness. Go and see them.—California Leader.

WAGONS.—Every species of wagons that any one can need, made of the best material, well fitted and finished, can be found at the Depot of MILLS & EVANS, 587 Market street, two doors from Second. Light, Express, Milk and Thoroughbrace wagons, also Lumber Gears, Extra Poles and Whiffletrees, with Lead Bars, are kept constantly on hand.—California Leader.

FOR the best finished, fashionable hats, go to McGann & Co.'s, Hatters, 654 Washington street, two doors below the Plaza.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend. JOSEPH SPARROW.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

M. Howard's Hair Restorative,
NO. 315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but, we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial. Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION,

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S
Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,

BOWMAN & CO.,
Dealers in Stoves and Tin Ware, mar24 6m Main street, Petaluma

TO FARMERS, MINERS, LABORERS

And all those wishing to secure themselves a portion of THE MOST VALUABLE AGRICULTURAL AND MINERAL LANDS OF MEXICO,

With an equal interest in the Profits of the Plantations of
THE MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON COMPANY.

HOMES FOR THE POOR AND COMPETENCY FOR ALL.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having reserved from their final Subscription List a Limited Number of Unassessable Shares, (the remaining shares of the Company having been taken up by the stockholders,) hereby offer the same for sale at the original subscription price of Sixteen Dollars each, payable in cash. Every holder of a share will be entitled to a portion of the Company's lands, having the privilege to settle thereon and participate in all the advantages and profits of the enterprise, and special privileges granted to this Company by an Imperial Decree of Maximilian, dated 9th January, 1866, without being subjected to the conditions of regular Government emigrants, this Company settling upon their own lands, secured by private purchase, and held under indisputable Spanish titles.

Shareholders becoming actual settlers will also have the privilege of any employment upon the Company's plantation. Portions of land will be allotted to settlers, to be held by them until a final division makes it their property.

For the purpose of increasing the value of the Company's land, and to create all the comforts of a home and society, it is the intention of the company to form a regular settlement and to lay out a town adjoining their present plantation into building lots, which will likewise be fairly divided between the 8,000 shares which comprise the total number of the company.

A large number of shareholders will settle upon the company's lands after the rainy season in October next. Many of them may then be employed by the company, or by others able to plant for themselves, or in developing the mineral resources of the adjoining mountains, etc., etc.

Men of all trades and professions, desiring to emigrate to Mexico, will have great advantages as shareholders of this company. They will find the lands already purchased for them at a rate equivalent to a free gift, to be held by each shareholder as his property, protected by the best Spanish titles, and the good will of all political parties now contending for the reins of government; the climate the most salubrious, and the land rich and fertile beyond description; every kind of game abounding; the rivers full of fish and with extensive beds of large oysters; altogether, a country where it is easy to procure a livelihood and the comforts of a home with less labor and less capital than in any other part of the world.

The extensive placer diggings, veins of silver, and solid quartz ledges, which are to be found in the immediate vicinity, and acknowledged to be rich and very extensive, can, by the presence of a number of settlers, be profitably developed. Many of these mines are to be found within the limits of the company's grant. The Sierra Madre or Mother Mountain of Mexico, situated only within about twenty miles from the coast, can be reached and developed with much greater facility than the more remote mines in the interior, and will therefore make the company's lands the most desirable to locate upon.

For Maps and Survey, and further information, apply at the office of the MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON CO., Betge's Book Store, Russ House, Montgomery street, between the hours of 11 and 1 o'clock.

☞ All the assessable stock having been taken up by mutual subscription of stockholders, the company will have no more shares to offer after the limited number of unassessable shares have been placed, and shall prefer to sell these to actual settlers—a single share of which will be sufficient to entitle them to a large portion of the lands.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED shareholders in the Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having investigated and satisfied ourselves of the importance of the enterprise, recommend the same to the public. We are convinced that under the management of the present officers of the company, with their efforts to induce industrious parties to locate upon the land, that the enterprise must become very profitable to all parties interested, and most beneficial to actual settlers.

[For the Californian.]

THE LEGENDS OF THE RHINE.

BEETLING walls with ivy grown;
Frowning heights of mossy stone;
Turret, with its flaunting flag
Flung from battlemented crag;
Dungeon-keep and fortalice,
Looking down a precipice
O'er the darkly-glancing wave
By the Lorlei haunted cave;
Robber-hold and maiden-bower—
Haunt of Love, and Crime, and Power:
That's the scenery, in fine,
Of the Legends of the Rhine.

One bold Baron, double-dyed—
Bigamist and fratricide—
And, as most the stories run,
Partner of the Evil One;
Injured innocence in white—
Fair but idiotic quite—
Wringing of her lily hands;
Valor fresh from Paynim lands;
Abbot ruddy; hermit pale;
Minstrel, fraught with many a tale—
Are the actors that combine
In the Legends of the Rhine.

Bell-mouthed flagons, round a board;
Suits of armor, shield and sword;
Kerchief with its bloody stain,
Ghost of the untimely slain;
Thunder-clap and clanking chain;
Headman's block and shining axe;
Thumbscrews, crucifixes, racks;
Midnight-tolling chapel bell,
Heard across the gloomy fell—
Are the "properties" that shine
In the Legends of the Rhine.

Maledictions, whispered vows
Underneath the arching boughs;
Murder, Bigamy, and Theft;
Travellers of goods bereft;
Rapine, Pillage, Arson, Spoil—
Everything but honest toil—
Are the deeds that best define
Every legend of the Rhine.

That virtue always meets reward—
But sooner when it wears a sword;
That Providence has special care
Of gallant knight and ladye fair;
That villains, as a thing of course,
Are always haunted by Remorse—
Is the moral, I opine,
Of the Legends of the Rhine. BRET.

Two gallant "sons of Erin," being just discharged from service, were rejoicing over the event, with a "wee taste of the cratur," when one, who felt all the glory of his own noble race, suddenly raised his pot above his head, and said: "Arrah, Mike, here's to the gallant old 69th—the last in the field, and the first to leave it." "Tut, tut, man," said Mike; "ye don't mane that." "Don't mane it, is it? Then what do I mane?" "You mane," said Mike, and he raised his glass high and looked lovingly at it, "Here's to the gallant 69th, equal to none!" And so they drank.

"MARK TWAIN" ON HIS TRAVELS.

AT HONOLULU: NEW SCENES AND STRONG CONTRASTS.

THE further I travelled through the town the better I liked it. Every step revealed a new contrast—disclosed something I was unaccustomed to. In place of the grand mud-colored brown stone fronts of San Francisco, I saw neat white cottages, with green window-shutters; in place of front yards like billiard-tables with iron fences around them, I saw those cottages surrounded by ample yards, about like Portsmouth Square (as to size,) thickly clad with green grass, and shaded by tall trees, through whose dense foliage the sun could scarcely penetrate; in place of the customary infernal geranium languishing in dust and general debility on tin-roofed rear additions or in bedroom windows, I saw luxurious banks and thickets of flowers, fresh as a meadow after a rain, and glowing with the richest dyes; in place of the dingy horrors of the "Willows," and the painful sharp-pointed shrubbery of that funny caricature of nature which they call "South Park," I saw huge bodied, wide-spreading forest trees, with strange names and stranger appearance—trees that cast a shadow like a thunder-cloud, and were able to stand alone without being tied to green poles; in place of those vile, tiresome, stupid, everlasting gold-fish, wiggling around in glass globes and assuming all shades and degrees of distortion through the magnifying and diminishing qualities of their transparent prison houses, I saw cats—Tom-cats, Mary Ann cats, long-tailed cats, bob-tail cats, blind cats, one-eyed cats, wall-eyed cats, cross-eyed cats, gray cats, black cats, white cats, yellow cats, striped cats, spotted cats, tame cats, wild cats, singed cats, individual cats, groups of cats, platoons of cats, companies of cats, regiments of cats, armies of cats, multitudes of cats, millions of cats, and all of them sleek, fat, lazy, and sound asleep; in place of roughs and rowdies staring and blackguarding on the corners, I saw long-haired, saddle-colored Sandwich Island maidens sitting on the ground in the shade of corner houses, gazing indolently at whatever or whoever happened along; instead of that wretched cobble-stone pavement nuisance, I walked on a firm foundation of coral, built up from the bottom of the sea by the absurd but persevering insect of that name, with a light layer of lava and cinders overlying the coral, belched up out of fathomless hell long ago through the seared and blackened crater that stands dead and cold and harmless yonder in the distance now; instead of cramped and crowded street-cars, I met dusky native women sweeping by, free as the wind, on fleet horses, and astraddle, with gaudy riding-sashes streaming like banners behind them; instead of the combined stenches of Sacramento street, Chinadom and Brannan street slaughter-houses, I breathed the balmy fragrance of jessamine, oleander, and the Pride of India; in place of the hurry and bustle and noisy confusion of San Francisco, I moved in the midst of a Summer calm and tranquil as dawn in the Garden of Eden; in place of our familiar skirting sand hills and the placid bay, I saw on the one side a frame-work of tall, precipitous mountains close at hand, clad in refreshing green, and cleft by deep, cool, chasm-like valleys—and in front the grand sweep of the ocean; a brilliant, transparent green near the shore, bound and bordered by a long white line of foamy spray dashing against the reef, and further out the dead, blue water of the deep sea, flecked with "white caps," and in the far horizon a single, lonely sail——

At this moment, this man Brown, who has no better manners than to read over one's shoulder, observes:

"Yes, and hot. Oh, I reckon not! (only 82 in the shade.) Go on, now, and put it all down, now that you've begun; just say, 'And more 'santipedes,' and cockroaches, and fleas, and lizards, and red ants, and scorpions, and spiders, and mosquitoes and missionaries'—oh, blame my cats if I'd live here two months, not if I was High-You-Muck-a-Muck and King of Wawhoo, and had a harem full of hyenas!" [Wahine—most generally pronounced wyheeny—seems to answer for wife, woman and female of questionable character, indifferently. I never can get this man Brown to understand that "hyena" is not the proper pronunciation. He says "It ain't any odds; it describes some of 'em, anyway."]

I remarked: "But, Mr. Brown, these are trifles."

"Trifles be blowed! You get nipped by one of them scorpions once, and see how you like it! There was Mrs. Jones, swabbing her face with a sponge; she felt something grab her cheek; she dropped the sponge and out popped a scorpion an inch and a half long! Well, she just got up and danced the Highland fling for two hours and a half—and yell! why, you could have heard her from Lu-wow to Hoolahoola, with the wind lair! and for three days she soaked her cheek in brandy and salt, and it swelled up as big as your two fists. And you want to know what made me light out of bed so sudden last night? Only a 'santipede'—nothing only a 'santipede,' with forty-two legs on a side, and every foot hot enough to burn a hole through a rawhide. Don't you know one of them things grabbed Miss Boone's foot when she was riding one day? He was hid in the stirrip, and just clamped himself around her foot and sunk his fangs plum through her shoe; and she just throwed her whole soul into one war-whoop and then fainted. And she didn't get out of bed nor set that foot on the floor again for three weeks. And how did Captain Godfrey always get off so easy? Why, because he always carried a bottle full of scorpions and santipedes soaked in alcohol, and whenever he got bit he always bathed the place with that devilish mixture or took a drink out of it, I don't recollect which. And how did he have to do once, when he hadn't this bottle along? He had to cut out the bite with his knife and fill up the hole with arnica, and then prop his mouth open with the boot-jack to keep from getting the lockjaw. Oh, fill me up about this lovely country! You can go on writing that slop about balmy breezes and fragrant flowers, and all that sort of truck, but you're not going to leave out them santipedes and things for want of being reminded of it, you know.

I said, mildly: "But, Mr. rown, these are the mere—"

"Mere—your grandmother! they ain't the mere anything! What's the use of you telling me they're the mere—mere—whatever it was you was going to call it? You look at them raw splotches all over my face—all over my arms—all over my body! Mosquito bites! Don't tell me about mere—mere things! You can't get around them mosquito bites. I took and brushed out my bar good night before last, and tucked it in all around, and before morning I was eternally chawed up, anyhow. And the night before I fastened her up all right, and got in bed and smoked that old strong pipe until I got strangled and smothered and couldn't get out, and then they swarmed in there and jammed their bills through my shirt and sucked me as dry as a life-preserver before I got my breath again. And how did that dead-fall work? I was two days making it, and sweated two buckets full of brine, and blame the mosquito ever went under it; and sloshing around in my sleep I ketched my foot in it and got it flattened out so that it wouldn't go into a green turtle shell forty four inches across the back. Jim Ayres grinding out seven double verses of poetry about Waw-hoo! and crying about leaving the blasted place in the two last verses; and you slobbering here about—there you are! Now—now, what do you say? That yellow spider could straddle over a saucer just like nothing—and if I hadn't been here to set that spittoon on him, he would have been between your sheets in a minute—he was travelling straight for your bed—he had his eye on it. Just pull at that webb he's been stringing after him—pretty near as hard to break as sewing silk; and look at his feet sticking out all round the spittoon. Oh, confound Waw-hoo!"

I am glad Brown has got disgusted at that murdered spider and gone; I don't like to be interrupted when I am writing—especially by Brown, who is is one of those men who always looks at the unpleasant side of everything, and I seldom do.

THE STEED "OAHU."

["Mark" in a subsequent letter thus recounts his experience with an eccentric steed which had been furnished him by the andl ord of the Americau Hotel, Honolulu. The party of which "Mark" was to have made one had started considerably in advance, on an excursion to Diamond's Head :]

The landlord of the Americau said the party had been gone nearly an hour. but that he could give me my choice of several horses that conld easily overtake them. I said, never mind—I preferred a safe horse to a fast one—I would like to have an excessively gentle horse—a horse with no spirit whatever—a lame one, if he had such a thing. Inside of five minutes I was mounted, and perfeetly satisfied with my ontfit. I had no time to label him "This is a horse," and so if the public took him for a sheep I cannot help it. I was satisfied, aud that was the main thiug. I could see that he had as many fine points as any man's horse, and I just hung my hat on one of them, behind the saddle, and swabbed the perspiration from my fuce and started. I named him after this island, "Oahu" (pronounced O-waw-hoo.) The first gate he came to he started in ; I had neither whip nor spur, and so I simply argued the case with him. He firmly resisted argumeut, but ultimately yielded to insult and abnse. He baeked out of that gate and steered for another one on the other side of the street. I trinmphed by my former process. Within the next six hundred yards he crossed the street fourteen times and attempted thirteen gates, and in the meantime the tropical sun was beating down and threatening to cave the top of my head in, and I was literally dripping with perspiration and profanity. (I am only human and I was sorely aggravated, I shall behave better next time.) He quit the gate bnsiness after that and went along peaceably enough, but absorbed in meditation. I noticed this latter circumstance, and it soon began to fill me with the gravest apprehension. I said to myself, this malignant brute is planning some new outrage, some fresh deviltry or other—no horse ever thought over a subject so profoundly as this one is doing just for nothing. The more this thing preyed upon my miud the more uneasy I became, until at last the suspense became unbearable and I dismounted to see if there was anything wild in his eye—for I had heard that the eye of this noblest of our domestic animals is very expressive. I cannot describe what a load of anxiety was lifted from my mind when I found that he was only asleep. I woke him up and started him into a faster walk, and theu the inborn villainy of his nature came out again. He tried to climb over a stone wall, five or six feet high. I saw that I must apply force to this horse, and that I might as well begin first as last. I plucked a stout switch from a tamarind tree, and the momeut he saw it, he gave in. He broke into a convulsive sort of a canter, which had three short steps in it and one long one, and reminded me alternately of the clattering shake of the great earthquake, and the sweeping plunging of the Ajax in a storm.

ETIQUETTE.

If yon get into conversation with a stranger in Honolulu, and experience that natural desire to know what sort of grouud you are treading on by finding out what manuer of man your stranger is, strike out boldly and address him as "Captain." Watch him narrowly, and if you see by his countenance that yon are on the wrong track, ask him where he preaches. It is a safe bet that he is either a missiouary or captain of a whaler. I am now personally acquainted with seventy-two captains and ninety-six missionaries. The captains and ministers form one-half of the population ; the third fourth is composed of common Kanakas and mercantile foreigners and their families, and the final fonrth is made up of high officers of the Hawaiian Government. And there are just about cats enough for three apiece all aronnd.

A solemn stranger met me in the suburbs yesterday, and said :

"Good morniug, your reverence. Preach in the stone church yonder, no doubt ?"

"No, I don't. I'm not a preacher."

"Really, I beg your pardou, Captain. I trnst yon had a good season. How much oil——"

"Oil ? Why, what do you take me for ? I'm not a whaler."

"Oh, I beg a thousand pardons, your Excellency. Major General in the household troops, no doubt ? Minister of the Interior, likely ? Secretary of War ? First Gentleman of the Bed-chamber ? Commissioner of the Royal——"

"Stnff ! man. I'm no official. I'm not connected in any way with the Government."

"Bless my life ! Then, who the mischief are you ? what the mischief are you ? and how the mischief did you get here, and where in thunder did you come from ?"

"I'm only a private personage—an unassuming stranger—lately arrived from America."

"No ? Not a missionary ! not a whaler ! not a member of his Majesty's Government ! not even Secretary of the Navy ! Ah, Heaven ! it is too blissful to be trne ; alas, I do but dream. And yet that noble, honest countenance—those oblique, ingenuons eyes—that massive head, incapable of—of—anything ; your hand ; give me your hand, bright waif. Excuse these tears. For sixteen weary years I have yearned for a moment like this, and——"

Here his feelings were too much for him, and he swooned away. I pitied this poor creature from the bottom of my heart. I was deeply moved. I shed a few tears on him and kissed him for his mother. I then took what small change he had and "shoved."—"Mark Twain," in the Sacramento Union.

HOW SUCCESSFUL AUTHORS ARE MADE.

THE Nation says : That there is a tide in the affairs of men in authorship as well as other mundane affairs, the writer of "A Night in the Workhonse" has every reason to aeknowledge. A few months ago he was nnknown, exeept, perhaps, among his circle of immediate friends, yet he had written for years, as a judicious reader of his famous article might have perceived from its excellence and finish, and on just snch subjects as he handled therein.

The golden opportunity came, or rather he went to it, one rainy night in a brougham, and like the young Dickens who discovered Mr. Pickwick for us, or my Lord Byron before him, who created that ennuyed debauchee, Childe Harold, he "woke up one morniug and fonnd himself famous." Who can it be ? asked his wonderiug countrymen, who have the good sense to relish the exposure of abuses, eveu at their own expense, and A answered, Mr. Tom Hughes, and B, Mr. Charles Dickens, und C, whatever writer happened to be uppermost iu his mind. There beiug no reason why the "Casual" should wear his anonymous mask, it was dropped, and Mr. James Greenwood came forward and made his bow to the pnblic for acknowledging his talents, and a mental vow to trespass again on their indulgence. This he has since done in a series of "Starlight Readings," in the Evening Star, and still further in a serial story, entitled "The Trne History of a Little Ragamuffin," to be completed iu twelve monthly parts at one shilling each, the first of which was issued on the 1st of March, with a wrapper by Hablot K. Browne (Phiz) and a frontispiece and vignette by J. Gordon Thomson. The ragged little hero whose fortunes Mr. Greenwood relates has a brutal father and a drunken stepmother, from whom he escapes to wander through the streets of Londou by day and to sleep under the Adelphi arches by night, consorting the while with outcasts and thieves, mudlurks and ruffiuus, experiencing the tender mercies of a Loudon workhouse through a fever, from which he recovers to continue, in other sceues und among more dangerous characters, his ragamuffiuly career to the end. If we may judge of Mr. Greenwood by what is written of his serial, he sees with "equal eye" the tragic and comic aspects of the lower stratum of London life, relieving the general sternness and gloom of his subject with flashes of bright und merry humor, aud showing throughout a deal of artistic eleverness.

"Since Defoe told the story of Colonel Jack's early experiences," says one of Mr. Greenwood's critics, "there has appeared no snch minutely graphic and terribly truthfnl picture of a London beggar-boy ; and thongh the work of the older novelist is to be preferred for the realism of its most pathetic touches, we are inclined to think that Mr. Greenwood's tale is no less essentially truthful, and no less calculated to maintain u pluce amongst the literary illustrutions of London poverty." The obscurity which hangs over Mr. Greenwood's previons literary career has not been lifted for us, further than that his last work, the oue we mean which immediately preceded A Night in the Workhouse, was The Hatchet-Throwers, a volume of grotesque humor, published last fall, with illnstratious by Ernest Griset, and not very well spoken of at the time.

THE subject of increased tariff on foreign books imported to this country continues to attract attentiou on the part of the booksellers. The bill which promineut publishers and printers have beeu urging npon the consideration of the congressional Ways and Means Committee calls for an advance of tweuty-five per cent. in the tariff on all books imported, and further proposes to levy the duties by weight instead of ad valorem, which we consider a decided mixing of matters. We are somewhat surprised that American publishers should be led to udvocate the passage of auy such bill as this. If they consider that their interests demand an iucrease of duties, they shonld at least insist npon some discrimiuation in the character of the books imported. There are certain rare and valuable publications which would never be repriuted in this couutry, and which can only be called for by scholars and professional men. These shonld not suffer from duties the same as the cheup editions which are sold here for less than our printers and bookbinders can afford to make them, and which may temporarily injure our own publishing interest. There should be some recognized difference between the two, or else the measure may do more harm than good. For ourselves we do not believe in the expediency of any increase of duties on foreign books. We would prefer that there shonld be a decrease rather than an advance, and in this way we believe the best interests of all would be subserved. This, however, does not seem to be the impression of the publishers, and it is more than likely that in the present state of feeling towards England their wishes will be complied with. If they thus succeed, and duties are imposed according to weight, we shall feel that an unjust and impolitic thing has been accomplished.—Round Table.

THE ART OF EMBROIDERY.

THE ancient art of embroidery has been gradually reviving for some years past, and is now all of a sudden coming rapidly into fashion. We regard this revival as being a subject of considerable importance. Embroidery will afford to our ladies an occupation for their leisure which is worthy of them, inasmuch as it demands taste and skill in the execution, and the products are of permanent value—in proportion, of course, to the amount of taste and skill bestowed upon them. It has been an annoyance and grief to us to see how the intelligence and taste, and skill and industry of our ladies have been employed upon a series of fashionable follies which were quite unworthy of them, and whose products were often of little use, and still more frequently of no artistic value whatever. Patchwork had its merits; it required some taste in the matching of colors, and it was capital practice in plain sewing. Berlin work had a great run, and a great many useful things could be made of it—screens and ottomans, chair and sofa covers, and what not besides; but filling up squares of canvas to match a pattern colored in squares was a wretched mechanical employment; a machine does it better and cheaper. And as for the products of the weary hours spent over the frames, where are they? They have long since been banished from every well-appointed drawing room, and drag out their coarse existence in the nursery or the bedrooms. And what shall we say of Poonah painting, with which the girls used to smear their fingers; and of Potichomanie, with which they gummed their morning frocks all over; and of bead work, whose disjecta membra we were continually crushing underfoot, to the detriment of the carpets and our own patience? Leather-work had its turn, and we must confess that we have seen some pretty things done in it; but they say it is very apt to harbor the dust and tumble to pieces; and certainly most of the things we saw done in leather-work were not pretty, for it required a good deal more skill in modelling than young ladies could be expected to possess. Very much the same words might be used in speaking of the wax-flower mania, except that they were not allowed to get dusty; but then it cost a good deal of money in glass shades to make the advantageous difference.

Embroidery is not, indeed, cheaper than these other occupations, for silk and gold thread are not cheap materials; but it certainly excels them in all other respects. It is a feminine occupation, for the tool with which it is wrought is the needle alone. It is one adapted to the drawing room, for it does not smear fingers or clothes, or make dust or chips; and it is really what the others are not—an elegant accomplishment, requiring some taste and skill, even in its simpler productions, and giving scope for any amount of artistic talent. Its results are not coarse, and mechanical, and unsatisfactory, but rich and elegant, and of permanent value, and may be applied to an endless variety of uses in wearing apparel, household furniture, and elegancies, and church furniture.—Boudoir.

MARRIAGES IN PHILADELPHIA.—The annual report of the Register of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Philadelphia, furnishes some very interesting hymenial statistics. During the past year 6,864 couples have launched into matrimony, and, we hope, a blissful state. Among these votaries of Hymen the Methodist appears to have been the most, and the New-Jerusalem the least popular ceremony. Of the whole number of persons married, 8,168 were natives of the United States, and 5,072 foreigners. The ages of the men married were as follows: "Under 20 years, 24; between 20 and 25 years, 2,325; between 25 and 30 years, 2,133; over 30 years, 2,008. The ages of the women married were as follows: Under 20 years, 1,266; between 20 and 30 years, 2,930; over 30 years, 1008.

By the above statistics it will be seen that men over thirty years of age stood twice as good a chance last year of marriage as women of the same age. But it is peculiarly true of marriage, that, "while there's life there's hope," and this hope especially favors the female portion of the community, for the Register informs us that, while five women married between the ages of sixty and seventy years, only two men of that age succeeded in securing wives. This exhibit of the frightful uncertainty of matrimony in the late stages of life should prove a valuable warning to the members of this community, especially to those who are daily throwing away "good chances." Saturday Night.

DR. HENRY ALFORD, author of A Plea for the Queen's English, tells the following: A student at one of our military academies had copied a drawing of a scene in Venice, and in copying the title, he had spelt the name of the city Vennice. The drawing-master put his pen through the superfluous letter, observing, "Don't you know, sir, there is but one hen in Venice?" On which the youth burst out laughing. Being asked what he was laughing about, he replied he was thinking how uncommonly scarce eggs must be there. The master, in wrath, reported him to the colonel in command, a Scotchman. He, on hearing the disrespectful reply without in the least perceiving the point of the joke, observed: "An' a varra naatural observaation, too.

PHARAOH'S SERPENTS.

FROM the little cone of silver foil
That fizzes and fumes with a fretful fire,
There oozes a serpent, all yellow and ribbed,
That rolls and thickens, and curls still higher.

The magic thing, as if by a spell,
Suddenly ceases its sluggish crawl;
Its fiery breath has quite burnt out,
And leaves a coil of dust—that's all.

The wise man's toy is a type of life;
And all our struggles for paltry things—
Our diplomatic treaties and talk,
Tangled and bound with red-tape strings;

Our spiders' webs, and our subtle plans;
Our love and joy, and our brittle dreams;
Our poor ambitions, that fleet away
Fast as the winter-torrent's streams;

Alexander's conquests, Cæsar's spoils;
All that we hate, and all that we trust;
The beggar's fears, and the rich man's hopes—
All end at last in the pinch of dust.

BOHEMIA AND THE BOHEMIANS.

IN a century like that in which we live, it is natural that many men and women of the highest culture should be unhappy and poor, because they have no tastes, no sympathies in common with the crowd of practical, money-making men, and are thrown back upon themselves. They are generally people of talent, sometimes even possessed of genius of a high order. They are, as a class, well worthy of study, and although the emigration westward has not been large, yet it includes several fine specimens of the people we mean, and will have many more with every passing year.

Your Bohemian is usually a writer, artist, musician, vocalist, engraver, or sometimes an old actor, incapacitated from playing. We do not assert no other professions are represented in the community, but these are the chief and the many—the scattering few usually following some odd or whimsical occupation.

These people betake themselves to cities as naturally as gipsies to the woods and highways. They have a disposition to sleep in the top stories of houses, and to eat and drink under ground. They know that an oyster loses its succulence and flavor if swallowed up stairs, as many ignorant respectable people will persist in doing, and that wines are impaired by being brought on a first floor. They are very fond of certain kinds of food, and eat with great relish, as no saints have ever done more fasting. This is to be attributed to the fact that they were over-working and forgot hunger, for "by fits and starts" they are as industrious as bees; that they were engrossed by some passion, pleasure or passing fancy, or really in want and too proud to let their distresses be known even to a friend in the outside world.

They brook constraint as little as any Romanny girl in Spain, and although writing much for magazines and journals are rarely regularly employed by anybody or engaged at anything, and one of their productions is readily distinguished from the stereotyped, mannered, labored productions of the editorial staff of "our own reporters." And yet, their MS. needs the services of this very class of men ere it goes into type, for a good Bohemian usually has some idiosyncracy that requires to be kept in the background, some bitterness that were better omitted, some fancy that is all the more airy and beautiful when pruned of its luxuriance by sharp scissors and a skillful hand. There are editors in the land who understand human nature and Bohemian nature (which is quite different) and render such people useful. Like children they must be petted, checked, corrected, but not crushed, and results generally prove the value of the care, for the Bohemian at his best is brilliant, and your "Able Editor" is always heavy and occasionally stupid.

There are no clocks and few watches in Bohemia, as the modern Israelites you meet lolling out in sunny days in their doorways with three golden balls overhead usually have them in safe keeping; and few time-pieces, as your real Bohemian is generally annoyed by the striking or tic-tac of a clock, and as the movements of society are usually regulated with some regard to time, the want of punctuality on the part of the Bohemian seriously militates against his success in a worldly point of view. He has a love of procrastination, and often will smoke and stare at children who are playing, when he should be in search of work. He is very fond of an occasional sunning, and you seldom meet him out on other than pleasant days. But by gaslight he is ubiquitous, and luxuriates on oysters, lobsters, and beer. Why, it is an inexplicable mystery, but certes, the author of Pickwick struck a profound truth when he stated the proposition that oysters and poverty are near neighbors, and that men involved in pecuniary difficulties rush out to consume their bivalves in sheer desperation, at a loss what else to do.

The ladies of Bohemia are not without their fascinations, and are usually women of any age between twenty-five and thirty. They have usually passed through more than one love episode, and are valuable contributors to the story-writing departments of papers of the New York Mercury or Ledger type. They are neither unprotected females, strong-minded women or lorettes, but women who have learned to take life as they find it; and living out their existence in their own free way, they are careless of what the world says—about which, to tell the truth, Bohemia cares very little.

Your Bohemian knows ten thousand makeshifts to get along, the outer world is ignorant of, and though he breakfasted on a crust is as merry at dinner as if he knew where the morrow's meal was to come from.

He is either a bachelor or a widower, sometimes a "grass" one—but once an inhabitant of Bohemia, his matrimonial prospects are sealed, for there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage among these people. Married, they would cease to be Bohemians, for how could the father of a family sleep occasionally on the table of a newspaper office, or have that careless laugh with his coat out at elbows? Matrimony and making money are not Bohemian characteristics.

FRENCH SYSTEM OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

THE French decimal system of weights and measures gains favor speedily among the nations of Europe. It is the legal system of France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland, and though the German nations still adhere to other measures of length and to their old names of weights, their actual weights have been made easily comparable with the French by the enactment that the pound shall be equal to one-half of a French kilogramme. A government commission has just recommended the introduction of the French system into the Austrian dominions. The metre and the gramme have become universal in books and memoirs upon the experimental sciences written in any European language. For scientific purposes the centigrade thermometer also is almost always employed. In England and in this country an excessively cumbrous and difficult system of weights and measures is still adhered to. In the French system there is a very simple relation between the unit of measure and the unit of weight. A cube of pure water of which the side measures one-hundredth of a metre weighs one gramme, the French unit of weight. The English weights and measures are compared together by the following rules: 277,274 cubic inches constitute an imperial gallon, and the gallon of pure water weighs ten avoirdupois pounds. The troy pound is to the avoirdupois pound as 144 to 175. Under the French system all substances and commodities are sold by the same weights and measures, viz: the gramme and litre and their decimal multiples. Under our system every different trade seems to have its peculiar weights and measures. Grocers, apothecaries, coal-dealers, liquor-dealers, grain-merchants, and tailors, have all their separate units of weight and measure, and the confusion which results is tolerated only because long usage has accustomed the community to inconveniences which they believe to be inevitable. We copied our weights and measures directly from England; our system is, therefore, not in any sense a national one. In fact, we first demonstrated the convenience of a decimal system when, in establishing our coinage, we took the old Spanish dollar for our unit and divided it into dimes and cents. Later, the French applied the decimal system to weights and measures. The English Parliament has taken one step toward the introduction of the metrical system; a very short one to be sure, after the English fashion of making haste slowly, but still a step worthy of attention and perhaps of imitation. Parliament has sanctioned the legal use of the metrical system; contracts may be made in the terms of this system. The enactment is merely permissive. To second this action of Parliament, the British Association for the Advancement of Science made an appropriation for erecting, in conspicuous places, mural tablets, bearing the metre and in subdivisions, with the double object of familiarizing the public with the difference between the yard and the metre, and of presenting accessible standards for purposes of ready comparison. At a recent meeting of the Chemical Society of London, a discussion took place on the best material for mural standards of length. Platinum, gilded brass, aluminium bronze, common bronze, gun-metal, cast-iron, and porcelain were all considered, the weight of opinion inclining to the cheaper substances, on the ground that extreme accuracy was not at all essential, and hardly attainable under such circumstances.

The subject has been repeatedly brought to the notice of our own Government and people in years past, and a proposition looking to the general introduction of the French system has been made in Congress during the present session. It is greatly to be wished that a hearty effort might now be made to carry this great measure. In these revolutionary times one more change in the habits of the people will not be hard to make. The metrical system was born of revolution in 1790.

When the chief nations of the world have but a single, uniform system of weights, measures, and coinage, what a simplification will be effected in commerce, travelling, and the affairs of common life! One large part of the curse which fell upon us at Babel will be removed, the arithmetic will have to be re-written, at least a year of life will be saved to every child, and the occupation of countless clerks all the world over will be forever gone.—The Nation.

AT A POET'S GRAVE.

One seared leaf quivering down
From the green choir that wails thy brief renown:
This is the poet's crown!

Where is thy skilful lnte,
That could provoke the birds to sweet dispnte?
Alas! for ever mute!

The hand that drew the balm
Of ravishing music from tuned strings, is calm;
The worm feeds on thy palm.

Not the majestic sweep
Of subtle melodies thy nerve could keep
From out the dusty heap.

The eager sun-rays dart
Through silken grasses, reaching for thy heart—
Of perfect gold a part.

The frail vine mantling
Thy undeservèd nakedness, doth cling
About thee, perishing.

Though no cut altar-stone
Is set to tell these ashes are thine own,
Thou art not all unknown.

Nor dost thon, voiceless, wait;
A thousand whispering tongues shall penetrate
The Heaven's pearly gate;

Siuging thine unsnng songs,
Chanting thy praises out of tuneful throngs,
And righting all thy wrongs.

I would some song dispense,
Bnt falter in my homely nterance,
For mnsic is flown hence.

IS SHE A HEROINE?

BY M. A. E.

THAT is the question I wish to put before the public. I have puzzled over it from morning till night, have dreamed about it, and grown thin upon it, and can find no solution thereof.

Her name was Mina Blake, and she lived among the hills. No matter what hills. There are a great many in this country unknown to fame, and she lived among some of them. She dwelt in a rough frame house, and there were plenty more like it among these hills. The situation was bleak, and the soil so poor that the old men and small boys did all the farm-work, while the rest of the people worked in the mines under the hills, or in the factories of the dingy smoky town that lay near them. These last were the aristocracy, and they looked down npon the miners who were "foreign" and "low."

These people never "carried their lives about them like clogs;" hard labor was not a "dull pain" to them (unless they were rheumatic;) they did uot look at strangers with "pitiful, dumb, animal eyes;" they did not stalk about with hands upon their brows and hearts, "pressing down their miseries to keep them silent." Nothing of the kind. For relief to their physical miseries they resorted to Drake's Plantation Bitters, and as a soother of mental miseries opinions were pretty equally divided, between the Bible and the tavern. They did not "strive to work out the problems of their lives," for they had extremely vague ideas in regard to problems, and life to them was a simple thing enough.

They got pretty fair wages, and ate, and drank, and slept, and talked polities, and some said their prayers, and some did not, and they all expected to go to heaven when they died. They shuffled along through life, half educated, and happy, and sooty, and conceited, got married, and died, and that was the end of them. Let them go; for it is clear that such unnatural specimens of the laboring class can be of no manner of use in a story.

Mina Blake worked in a factory. She was not in the habit of standing by the looms, and thinking how they were eru ing the beauty and sweetness out of her life (she did not know that they were, she was so stupid) nor did she wonder if they were "weaving the web of her destiny;" nor did she walk among the whirling wheels with great thoughts whirling through her dizzy brain. If she had done these things, her wages would have been docked, and she knew it.

Neither did she live on fruit and cream in the summer, and in the winter on "corn cakes tinted a delicate brown, and spread with golden butter." The fruit that grew on the hills was scraggy and sonr, and the grass thin and poor, and half the year Mina saw no butter. Mnsh and molasses, bacon and brown bread constituted her ordinary food.

When the war broke out, she did not urge her only brother to go, and pack his knapsack with smiling lips and tearful eyes. Not she. For when at last he was dratted, she hid him under the hay in a neighbor's barn, and when he was dragged out and marched off, she nearly cried her eyes out. And, after his first battle, when he was reported "missing," she did not go into a state of musing melancholy, and fancy him lying in a lonely spot in a far-off forest, with his musket rusting at his side, and the waters of a brook rippling gently over his still feet. The picture that filled her mental vision was a room in a Canada taveru with the "missing" one seated at a table, with other choice spirits, playing the instructive game of poker, and with still other choice spirits in junk bottles on the tables. And so she dried her eyes aud was content.

It is plain enough, so far, that Mina was no heroine, and so different was she from any other factory girl who ever lived and breathed—in books—that if I had not seen her last week, I should be disposed to believe that she never did exist at all, but that I dreamed all that I am going to tell you

One pleasant Sunday morning, some two or three summers ago, Mina went to church arrayed in her best. She wore a blue dress; not because it was "the color of truth and heaven," nor because it was "the ontward symbol of the deep, liquid purity of which factory girls always have for wearing blue; her soul," nor for any other reasons of this kind, but simply because it cost ten cents less in the yard than any other of the nice goods at Poole's store. She also wore a straw bonnet trimmed with green rosettes, a black silk shawl, und pink kid gloves. This was Mina's idea of elegance. I know that working girls, who have any claim to be heroines, huve an intuitive perception of what is refined and harmonious, and it grieves me much to be compelled to admit that Mina had not.

I have been particular in describing her dress, not that it has anything whatever to do with the incidents I am about to relate, which would have happened all the same whether she had worn baize, or broadcloth, but because a heroine's dress is always described when anything is going to happen to her.

Mina had a bright, attractive face, and looked pretty in spite of the conjunction of pink, blue, green, and black upon her small person.

When she arrived at church, she found nearly all the congregation assembled, but the service had not begun; so, after setting her dress, and opening her fan, she looked demurely rouud to see what was to be seen. And the first sight that met her eyes so arrested her attention that she saw nothing more. Tom Hartle was looking at Kitty Smith! A young man gazing at a young girl is not a wouder upon the earth, but this particular young man was Mina's property. They had been engaged for some time, aud, until the Smiths came into the neighborhood, he had been a very attentive lover. Kitty was the prettiest girl in all that country. She had red lips and pink cheeks, and great innocent brown eyes, and the loveliest golden brown hair that was always kept short and curled itself into shining rings all over her head.

Mina knew that Tom had an unbounded admiration for Kitty Smith. It cut the poor girl to the very heart; but she did not neglect her work, and go wandering about the woods in an insane manner, nor was she consumed by a "dumb, tearless sorrow." No. She gave Tom two or three good rouud scoldings about the matter; which he always answered by asserting that he cared nothing whatever for Kitty, but that he wasn't going to be such a slave that he couldn't look at a pretty girl; and then Mina would take a cry, and then they would "kiss and make up."

But Tom had not been to see her now for two weeks, and in that time Mina had thought over the matter a great deal, aud had begun to see the right way through it, as she would have expressed it. Some of these thoughts were in her mind now, but the minister gave out the hymn, and Mina tried to put all such worldly thoughts away: for she was a good, religious girl, and believed in everything that was proper aud orthodox. I know that factory heroines are perpetually wouderiug why the All Powerful permits sin, and theu punishes it—why they are cursed with inherited viees—that they are sentimental infidels in short—fearing to trust themselves to a gloomy and cruel faith. None of these doubts and fears had Mina. She believed herself in the straight and narrow way, and she knew perfectly well that all infidels and Romau-catholics would go to hell. Perhaps in the very bottom of her heart she wished it were not so, but she would never have dared to utter this, even to her own consciousness; she would have thought it wicked—a suggestion of the devil.

The congregation were accustomed to spend the intermission in the graveyard, where they gathered into groups to eat their lunch, and to gossip. Mina stole away to an uninviting spot where the old tombstones were half sunk in the earth, and the graves overgrown with weeds. Here she thought she would not be followed, for she wanted to think about Tom.

She had been there bnt a few minutes when she saw him coming slowly towards her, with eyes bent upon the ground.

"He is sorry, poor fellow!" she thought; "I know he is sorry."

Tom started on seeing her. "How you do startle a fellow, Mina!" he said. "And you look like a ghost. What is the matter? Does anything trouble you, Miua?" he added in a more kindly tone.

Mina did not lean her pale face against the tombstone, and say: "God knows!" or look at him reproachfully like a dumb animal being led to the slaughter, or do anything else she ought to have done. She looked at him with contempt, and exclaiming. "Tom Hartle, you are a fool!" walked away as fast as she could, for fear she should cry, which was a weakness of hers.

She did not go far. The thoughts that Tom's unlucky question had dissipated, came back to her, and turning suddenly round she went back to the place where she had left him. He was leaning against the fence, looking at the hills in the distance with a sad and troubled face.

"Tom," said Mina kindly, laying her hand on his shoulder, "I know what you are thinking about. Don't grieve over it. It can't be helped, and you're not a bit to blame for it, and I guess it will all come out right in the end somehow."

And she was gone before Tom quite comprehended her words.

Tom did not intend to walk home with Kitty Smith, but when they went out of church, and she looked at him with her great brown eyes, he was drawn te her side as by a magnet, and they walked away together; and Miua saw it, and it made her angry. Angry that he had so little consideration for her after what she had said to him in the graveyard, and more angry because he did it in the sight of all the congregation who she knew wondered at it, and pitied her.

Her road was the same as theirs, but she went round a longer way to the quarry, so as to avoid walking behind them. The quarry was half way home, and when she got there she sat down to rest in a thick growth of young pines, upon the summit of a breezy hill. But she was destined to find no mental repose that day, for she had been there but a few minutes when Tom and Kitty came in sight. They had loitered long on the road. They should have been home by this time. Mina watched them as they seated themselves on the grass near her place of concealment, and she noted Kitty's coquettish ways, and Tom's increasiug admiration.

"I wish she would slip down into the qnarry, and break her neck!" thought Mina.

At last, on Kitty's expressing a wish for some wild gooseberries, Tom went off on a search for some. He was gone a loug time, and Kitty began to yawn, and Mina wished most heartily he would come back, so they could go home and she could get away. Kitty spied a tuft of columbines nodding on the very edge of the hill, and, true to her natural instinct of gratifying a present pleasure without a thought beyond, she ran to them and plucked them up. The ground here was sloping, the grass dry, and slippery. She felt herself gliding swiftly down the hill, and, clutching wildly at the air, she caught hold of a birch sapling as she swung off, which had been quarried away until its rocky sides were almost smooth for a descent of some forty feet. And there she hung, her only support the sapling which she grasped with her left hand, and which bent so low with her weight that its plumed top touched her head. She knew it must break soon, aud she looked at the jagged rocks far below her, and cried, and shrieked for help.

If she had had any presence of mind she would have seen that she had one chance for life. Mina saw it in a flash, and called out to her:

"Swing yourself a little to the right, Kitty. and put your feet upon that little point of rock. Don't you see it?"

"I see it!" shrieked Kitty, "but I can't do it. Help me! O help me!"

Mina ran to the spot. There was no friendly rock or bush to hold to—nothing but the shelving bank, aud slippery grass, aud the one sapling which was the frail support of poor Kitty. She threw herself upon the ground, as far from the edge as she could, and seized hold of Kitty's wrist.

"Now, Kitty, don't let go the sapling. and swing yourself upon that rock—you can easily do it."

"I can't do it! I shall fall if I move! Pull me up, Mina, pull me up!"

"I can't," said Mina. "The grass is slippery, and there's nothing to hold by, and I haven't the strength. Get on the rock; Tom will soon be here."

But the terror-stricken Kitty began to struggle, and Mina felt herself moving towards the edge of that awful precipice.

"You are pulling me off, Kitty. I can't hold you if you struggle. The rock is your only chance."

But Kitty would only scream. and struggle, and now Mina was drawn so near the edge that she could see far down into that fearful depth.

"I will let her go," she thought, "she will kill me if I don't." But her next thought was, "What shall I tell Tom when he comes back? No, I will save her, or we will die together."

She saw that a root of the sapling was above the ground. This was a little thing, indeed, but it gave her some hope. Still keeping hold of Kitty's wrist, she raised herself on her knees, and working herself slowly and carefully along that treacherous bank, she reached the root, and fixed her knees firmly against it. Then taking off her shawl she lowered it to Kitty's hand. Kitty clutched it with so strong and despairing a hold that Miua shook and tottered. She recovered herself, aud closing her eyes for an instant to summon all her courage, and to commend her soul to God, she exerted all her strength, and swinging Kitty round landed her in safety on the little rocky ledge. And now some of Kitty's sense return.

ing to her, she managed, with the help of Mina and the shawl, to scramble upon the hill, where the two girls had a brief struggle yet to keep from sliding off, until with blanched cheeks and bloodshot eyes they stood upon firm ground, and looked at each other.

At this point Mina should have fainted, but, instead of that, she gave Kitty a good shaking.

"You silly baby!" she exclaimed. "You came near putting an end to both of us. Why didn't you do as I told you to?"

And then she sat down on the ground and cried. And Kitty cried, too, and between her sobs she said: "Oh, Mina! you've saved my life—and you are so good—and I've been—so naughty—and I've tried—I've tried—to steal your beau—eu!"

"I know it," said Mina, shortly, choking back the tears. "And that isn't the worst of it, Kitty."

"There can't be any worse," said Kitty.

"Yes, there can," said Mina. And then they both fell to crying again, and Kitty put her arms round Mina's neck, and kept sobbing: "Oh! what shall I do?" To which question she got no answer.

And thus the amazed Tom found them, and Kitty told the story, and Tom trembled to think how near death Kitty had been, and he knew he ought to have thought first of Mina, and that he ought to say something, but he only stood twirling the ends of his silk handkerchief, and wishing he was a girl so he could cry, too.

But Mina dried her eyes, using for that purpose a pink kid glove instead of her handkerchief, for she was in sore trouble.

"Tom," she said, in thick and husky tones, "you love Kitty, and she will love you sometime if she don't now. And I won't stand in your way. And so it's all over between us, and you mustn't feel sorry for me. I know you wouldn't have broken with me, and that you meant to stand to your promise; but it wouldn't be right, you know, to marry me with love for another woman in your heart. And now I will go home by myself. I would rather, and you had better wait till Kitty feels better."

Here Tom should have delivered a speech clothed in that tender and simple language, and with that beautiful pathos and refinement of feeling for which we all know poor young working men are remarkable. But he was an exception to this class, and so he only twirled his handkerchief the harder, and looked foolish, and was dreadfully afraid he would cry, and only managed to say, "Don't, Mina, don't break with me in this way. We will talk it over."

"No, Tom," said Mina, "there's no use in talking it over—I know it all. Don't feel sorry for me. You couldn't help it, and I couldn't help doing what I have to-day, and what I am doing now, and Kitty couldn't help being pretty. And now don't you be feeling sorry for me."

And so she left them; and the two stood watching her in silence, and shame, and pity, while she went her way across the field until she seemed to them to melt into the crimson and golden glories of the west.

And now it would seem as if Mina had established a sort of claim to be considered a heroine; but then, you see, she did nothing in the orthodox way.

And, moreover, after these events she did not pine away into a "beautiful and luminous shadow," and die placidly and serenely at sunset, or sunrise (never by any possible chance in the middle of the day; shadowy heroines, and especially "luminous" ones, being governed by different laws from other shadows) after giving Tom her blessing, and Kitty her Sunday clothes. No, indeed. I am sorry to say she still persists in keeping alive and well. And worse than this (if anything can be worse,) she bought a cow with the money she had put aside for her wedding finery; and now, having plenty of buttermilk to drink, is getting rather stout.

And now I am sure the public will take pity on me and solve the puzzle I cannot, and which has robbed me of rest and pleasure, and answer the question: Is she a heroine?—New York Saturday Press.

Intricacies of the English Language.—The construction of the English language must appear most formidable to a foreigner. One of them, looking at a picture of a number of vessels, said: "See, what a flock of ships!" He was told that a flock of ships was called a fleet, and that a fleet of sheep was called a flock. And it was added, for his guidance in mastering the intricacies of our language, that "a flock of girls is called a bevy, that a bevy of wolves is called a pack, and a pack of thieves is called a gang, and a gang of angels is called a host, and a host of porpoises is called a shoal, and a shoal of buffaloes is called a herd, and a herd of children is called a troop, and a troop of partridges is called a covey, and a covey of beauties is called a galaxy, and a galaxy of ruffians is called a horde, and a horde of rubbish is called a heap, and a heap of oxen is a drove, and a drove of blackguards is called a mob, and a mob of whales is called a school, and a school of worshippers is called a congregation, and a congregation of engineers is called a corps, and a corps of robbers is called a band, and a band of locusts is called a swarm, and a swarm of people is called a crowd."

Buried Alive.—In a late debate in the French Senate, on the petition of M. de Cornol, setting forth the danger of burying those who are not dead by hasty interments, Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux, recited three cases of living persons supposed to be dead, whom during his experience as a priest he saved from burial. In two cases there was a complete restoration of life—one of the persons so rescued, a lady of distinguished family, is now a happy wife and mother. A fourth case told by the Archbishop accounts for his own long-sustained attention to the subject. He said:

"In the summer of 1826, on a close and sultry day, in a church which was excessively crowded, a young priest who was in the act of preaching was suddenly seized with giddiness in the pulpit. The words he was uttering became indistinct, he soon lost the power of speech, and sank down on the floor. He was taken out of the church and carried home. All was thought to be over. Some hours after the funeral bell was tolled, and the usual preparations made for the interment. His eyesight was gone; but if he could see nothing, like the young lady I have alluded to, he could hear, and I need not say that what reached his ears was not calculated to reassure him. The doctor came, examined him, and pronounced him dead; and after the usual inquiries as to his age and the place of his birth, etc., gave permission for his interment next morning. The venerable bishop in whose cathedral the young priest was preaching when he was seized with the fit came to his bedside to recite the De Profundis. The body was measured for the coffin. Night came on, and you will easily feel how inexpressible was the anguish of the living being in such a situation. At last, amid the voices murmuring around him, he distinguished that of one whom he had known from infancy. That voice produced a marvellous effect and a superhuman effort. Of what followed I need say no more than that the seemingly dead man stood next day in the same pulpit. That young priest, gentlemen, is the same young man who is now speaking before you, and who, more than forty years after that event, implores those in authority, not merely to watch vigilantly over the execution of the legal prescriptions with regard to interments, but to enact fresh ones in order to prevent the recurrence of irreparable misfortunes."

Ventilation of the Sick-Room.—With a proper supply of windows and a proper supply of fuel in open fire-places, fresh air is comparatively easy to secure when your patient or patients are in bed. Never be afraid of open windows then. People don't catch cold in bed. This is a popular fallacy. With proper bed-clothes, and hot bottles, if necessary, you can always keep a patient warm in bed, and well ventilate him at the same time. I know an intelligent, humane house-surgeon, who makes a practice of keeping the ward windows open. The physicians and surgeons invariably close them while going their rounds, and the house-surgeon very properly as invariably opens them whenever the doctors have turned their backs. Do you ever go into the bed-rooms of any persons of any class, whether they contain one, two, or twenty people—whether they hold sick or well, at night or before the windows are opened in the morning, and ever find the air anything but unwholesomely close and foul? And why should it be so? And of how much importance it is that it should not be so! During sleep the human body, even when in health, is far more injured by the influence of foul air than when awake. Why can't you keep the air all night, then, as pure as the air without, in the room you sleep in? But for this you must have sufficient outlet for the impure air you make yourself to go out; sufficient inlet for the pure air from without to come in. You must have open chimneys, open windows, or ventilators; no close curtains round your beds; no shutters or curtains to your windows—none of the contrivances by which you undermine your own health or destroy the chances of recovery of your sick.—Miss Nightingale.

The poetry of Mr. Thomas Bailey Aldrich is thus spoken of in the London Athenæum: "It is some years," it says, "since we have met with an American poet so rich in achievement and promise as Mr. Aldrich. In his opening poem, 'Judith,' there are traces of Mr. Tennyson's manner, but they disappear as we proceed in the volume. Indeed, 'Judith,' though the most ambitious effort in the selection, is by no means the most successful. The incidents of the tale are well told, and the physique, so to speak, of Judith is characteristically presented; but the depths of her nature are not sounded—the conflict of motives and self-devotion which triumphs in the end are too vaguely set forth." The critic quotes a few passages from Mr. Aldrich's volume, and sums up his comments as follows: "We do not, as yet, find in Mr. Aldrich the sustained moral beauty of Longfellow; but he has, without imitation, as much force and minuteness of description as his predecessor, and almost as much music. The author of this volume is an addition to that small band of American poets which is so slowly reinforced."

A French religious paper, speaking of "Gladiator's" success on the English turf, says: "We are delighted in our souls to see a Roman Catholic horse beating Protestant horses!"

A Continent Covered with Ice.—Professor Agassiz comes to the conclusion that the continent of North America was once covered with ice a mile in thickness, thereby agreeing with Professor Hitchcock, and other geological writers, concerning the glacial period. In proof of this conclusion, he says that the slope of the Alleghany range of mountains are glacier-worn to the very top, except a few points which were above the level of the icy mass. Mount Washington, for instance, is over six thousand feet high, and the rough, unpolished surface of the summit, covered with loose fragments, just below the level of which glacier marks come to an end, tells that it lifted its head above the desolate waste of ice and snow. In this region, then, the thickness of the ice cannot have been much less than six thousand feet, and this is in keeping with the same kinds of evidence in other parts of the country, for when the mountains are much below six thousand feet, the ice seems to have passed directly over them, while the peaks rising to that height are left untouched. The glacier, he argues, was God's great plough; and when the ice vanished from the land, it left it prepared for the hand of the husbandman. The hard surface of the rocks was ground to powder, the elements of the soil were mingled in fair proportions; granite was carried into the lime regions, lime was mingled with the arid and unproductive granite district, and a soil was prepared fit for the agricultural uses of man. There are evidences all over the polar regions, to show that at one period the heat of the tropics extended all over the globe. The ice period is supposed to be long subsequent to this, and next to the last before the advent of man.

Manufacture of Eyes.—We have gleaned the following curious details of the manufacture of false eyes in the city of Paris, from an exchange: "The average sale per week of eyes intended for the human head amounts to four hundred. Paris appears to have the monopoly of this strange trade, which does not lead one to conclude that the population of that gay city is very clear-sighted. Twelve manufactories flourish within the barriers, each of which gives employment to twenty workmen. English and American enamellers have vainly endeavored to compete with the French artists. 'Do you see, sir,' remarked one of the first of these, not oculists, but ocularists, 'Englishmen have not sufficient taste for this trade; their eyes are only good enough for stuffed animals.' The trade is very remunerative. The said ocularist receives one in a magnificent saloon, resplendent with gilding and mirrors. His servant has but one eye, and if you want to see the effect of one of the eyes, he wrings the bell and tries the eye in the wretched servant's head, so that you may judge of the effect it will produce in your own or that of your friend. He charges 40f. or 50f. For the poor there are second-hand visual organs, which have been worn by some eyeless duke or nabob, and exchanged for a new one after twelve month's service. These are then sold to the poorer classes at a reduced price, or sent off to America, India, or the Sandwich Islands, where the colored races are not quite so fastidious as regards the match. One of the Emperor Soulouque's generals heard of these artificial eyes, and wrote to Paris to order one. The ocularist, flattering himself that a successful eye would secure for him one of the Haytian crosses, devoted his utmost intelligence to the production of a chef d'œuvre. Six months elapsed—a small box reached him from Hayti. A cross glittered in his imagination, when, lo! to his horror, within the folds of cotton, lay his original eye, accompanied by the following note: 'Sir.—The eye you forwarded to me is of a tint that resembles that of the Spanish flag, and I am too patriotic to wear any but the color of my country.' The ocularist proceeded at once to the admiralty, there ascertained the colors of the Haytian flag, and then manufactured a scarlet and green eye, which he forwarded by the earliest opportunity."

Contempt of Court.—In a village, not a thousand miles from this city, there lives a quiet, unobtrusive young lawyer. A modest fellow is M. (merit is always modest,) but he knows his rights, "and knowing, dares maintain them." Like a great many others, he is "following the practice," and anticipates "a glorious time," when he overtakes it. Whiles since, having been retained in some small cases, he made his appearance before that august dignitary—a Justice of the Peace. "His Honor" evidently lost faith in M—— at first sight; for, one after another, his cases "collapsed" under the "stunning" charges delivered by the Court.

The law and the testimony were alike unavailing. M.'s cases were bound to go. At last human nature could bear no more. M., rising from his seat, delivered himself in his usual slow and measured manner:

"The Court can fine me five dollars."

"For what, Mr. M.?" said the Justice, somewhat surprised.

'For contempt of Court," coolly rejoined M.

"I am not aware, Mr. M.," said the Court, "of your having been guilty of anything that might be considered contempt."

"I know your Honor is not aware of it," said M., "but I entertain a secret contempt for this Court."

THE CONUNDRUM OF TO-DAY.

I HAVE always taken a great interest in Conundrums, and of late years have been quite a diligent collector of them—so much so, in fact, that I am well known to professional and amateur artists in this line, as being always ready to add to my extensive collection any really valuable article of the kind. The particular attention I have given to the subject has enabled me to perceive the great change that has taken place in the nature of the conundrum since the days of my youth and early manhood. Then, we used to have a straightforward and simple question, often by no means easy to answer, but which was expected to be answered, even if our noddles wearied and ached in the process of our solution. In those days it was: "Why is A like B?" Answer: "Because it is C." Nothing could be plainer than that.

But of late, it is not considered at all polite to attempt to answer a conundrum. The propounder must have the pleasure of divulging the answer as a reward for his trouble in putting the question. Besides, there is reason to fear that few persons could state, in the warmth of the first discovery, the answer to a modern conundrum in such manner as not to misdirect or injure the point. The reason for this is the general change that has taken place in the form of the puzzle, as well as in that of the answer. Now it is fashionable to ask, "What is the difference between A and B?" Answer: "One is C, and the other is D." Giving reason to suppose that the study of differential calculus was becoming so popular as to make itself visible even in our mental diversions. I can best illustrate this subject by giving, as examples, a few of my recent acquisitions which I will take at random from my lower shelf, labelled "unclassified."

The first that comes to hand is one I bought of a young man, who, now but a tyro in his art, I believe will soon become capable of much better things. It is this: "What is the difference between a man sewing a sail with a cambric needle, and a parish in Liberia in need of a constable?" Answer: "One wants a bigger needle, and the other a nigger beadle."

It must not be supposed that the value of a conundrum depends upon its length. I will give an instance of mistaken belief in this respect. A gentleman was ushered into my study a few days since, who announced that he had a conundrum which he would like to dispose of. I told him that I should be glad to hear it, and begged him to be seated and proceed to state it. He thereupon drew a chair to the table, and pulled from his pocket a sheet of foolscap.

"You do not trust to your memory," I said, smiling.

"Oh, no!" he answered, "not in this instance, for my conundrum is in three chapters."

"Three chapters!" I cried, "why, in the whole course of of my long life I have never heard of such a thing as a conundrum in three chapters."

"Nevertheless, it is true, sir, as you shall hear if you wish."

"Certainly, I wish it," I replied, "I would not on any account miss hearing it, although I am much inclined to doubt the success of so combined an undertaking."

"Judge for yourself, sir," he answered, and proceeded to read the manuscript, as follows:

CHAPTER I.

It is doubtless generally known that near Mount Cenis a tunnel through the Alps is in process of excavation. From the opening on either side of the mountain, the tunneling has proceeded for about a mile, and the darkness and gloom of the cavern in which the workmen delve, day after day, can scarcely be imagined by those whose lives have been spent merely on the smiling surface of the earth—I will not attempt to picture it.

CHAPTER II.

In the south of England, a gentleman named Purker possessed a farm, the greater part of which, being subject to inundations, was useless for purposes of tillage. Being of an enterprising disposition, Mr. Parker conceived the idea of draining these meadows, and, after years of labor, succeeded in doing so by means of a long and wide ditch, which was at once the source of wealth to him, and of wonder to the country side.

CHAPTER III.

What is the difference between this ditch and the tunnel under the Alps?

EPILOGUE.

One is Parker's ditch, and the other dark as pitch.

It is needless to say that I purchased this, if it were only for the unique character of the thing.

Not long ago I was in Fulton Market, and I inquired of a boy, sitting at a vegetable stall, the price of sweet potatoes.

"I have none, doctor," said he (in some way recognizing me,) "but I have a conundrum if you want one."

"Well," said I, "if I can't get one thing, I will take another. What is your conundrum?"

"Pay first, sir, if you please; for if you don't take it after you've heard it, it can't be sold for fresh."

Pleased with the sharpness of the boy, which augured future success in business, I gave him a fifty-cent note, with which he seemed satisfied, and asked me:

"What is the difference between Stephens, the great Fenian, and a lot of werry cheap cabbage?"

"Don't know," said I, as in duty bound.

"Because," said he, with a grin, "one is a head-centre, and the other is a cent a head,"

There are many persons who imagine themselves able to construct a conundrum, who, although perhaps possessed of more than the average amount of wit, were never intended by nature for that line of art. For instance, a friend who had thought of putting a son into the business, came to ask my opinion about the matter, and brought the following as a specimen of his boy's ability: "Why are the street contractors not needed in Nassau street?—Because it is contracted enough already."

Of course, I gave the too fond father no encouragement.

Now, I have a nephew, a mere school boy, who has already done some pretty good things in this line, although he has no idea that he possesses any talent. I think it not improbable that by the time he is my age, he will be able to look back upon many good conundrums. The other day he brought me this, which he called a penultimate riddle: "Why were the lions of King Darius very obstinate beasts?—Because they would take no Daniel."

There have been instances (not in this country only, for I notice a case of the kind mentioned in an English paper) of persons who possessed very excellent answers to conundrums, but had never been able to fit them with appropriate questions. I know a very worthy man, quite poor, with a large family, who for years has been endeavoring to discover a question which would serve as prefix to the answer, "Witch of Endor (which offend her.)" It is highly probable that, as in the case of too many ill-fated sons of genius, his uncompleted invention will be brought to perfection by others after he has died in poverty.

But it must, by no means, be supposed that conundrumists, as a class, are men in humble circumstances. On the contrary, many of them are in receipt of handsome incomes from the proceeds of their quaint devices, and some, I grieve to say, have met with a success which has made them sordid and mean in regard to pecuniary matters. One in particular, I remember, who from myself receives a handsome yearly sum for his productions, and who, when reminded by me lately, on presenting his monthly bill, of the absence of the necessary revenue stamp upon the document, said: "Pshaw! I think the government is altogether two-cents-tive about such matters."

Comment is needless.

Having now said enough to show the difference between the conundrum of to-day, and those to which we were accustomed in our youth, I close without offering an opinion upon the merits of the very different styles, content with the position of a chronicler, without aspiring to that of a philosopher.

Wishing well to the craft, I am theirs truly,

A SELFISH WIT.— * * Then, proud, fast, and gentleman-like as the Prince, Lord Alvanley, first of dandies, with wit to dignify him, gleams through these pages. Coldly and cruelly selfish seems this very first of his class. He inherited an estate of £8,000 a year; but he was so faithless to his trust, that his brother and successor found three-fourths of the revenue squandered. Alvanley once made out a list of his debts, but forgot one little item of £50,000. He bought at any price, and could well afford it, considering his careless economy. "How much did you give for that mare?" asked Johnny Armstrong of him. "Well," said my lord, in his pleasant, off-hand way, "I owe Miller 300 guineas for her!" Jack Talbot, Alvanley's best friend, was wont to take a bottle of sherry at breakfast, because he always drank over night, and it did him good; and, naturally, Jack was at death's door while he was yet but a young fellow. His doctor told Alvanley that he must use the lancet. "You'd better tap him, doctor," said Alvanley; "Jack has less blood in him than claret." But Alvanley could say better things. When Nield, at the head of his own table, kept his guests hungry while he directed attention to the gilt cornices of his dining-room, Alvanley remarked, "We have had enough of your gilding, let us now have some of your carving."—Review of Gronow's "Reminiscences."

A CORRESPONDENT in Paris writes: "Paris must have its lion as a child must have its toy. No matter at what cost, a grand besoin must be supplied. La Diva was the favorite of the hour. She must be had at any price. Accordingly, Bagier gives her 5,000 francs per night. But now we have secured her captivating presence and delicious voice, we must have something novel, a complete contrast. La Patti is pre-eminently feminine in her winning grace and childlike mutinerie. The reverse is Mlle. Mela, the female tenor, whose masculine appearance and male intonation will produce a new sensation. Mlle. Mela is a Sicilian, and her voice is splendid. In Italy her success in parts hitherto only taken by Mario, Rubini, Duprez, or Tamberlik, has been tremendous. Her appearance in a slashed velvet pourpoint, a rapier at her side, and a scarlet plumed hat on her head, perfectly at home in a man's garb, is described as something startling. In Paris she has only been heard at the concerts given by the railway king, Emile Pereire, by the great Rossini, and by the Duke Pozzo di Borgo. Her voice is not her only male acquirement. Mlle. Mela fences better than most adepts in that art, and can beat the most agile acrobat in gymnastic exercises.

THE STORY OF A FIDDLE.

NOT the least interesting relic of the war that we have seen—one that is most peculiarly blended with the memories of the past—is nothing more nor less than a fiddle. Not even Cremona's far-famed violins so cluster with reminiscences and associations as this.

Who does not know that Italy, nay, that Florence itself, is the cradle of civilization?—that there arose modern painting, poetry, sculpture, literature, philosophy, law, politics, and the opera? We don't know exactly where the fiddle took its origin, but there is no one in Vermont who has not felt its magic power, and who does not associate with its strains the brilliantly lighted ball-room; the array of beauty in all its first ringletted flush and prime; long sleigh rides, thanksgiving dinners, etc., etc. And it is natural that while our boys were lying at Brandy Station, on the Rappahannock, during the gloomy winters of 1864-5, their thoughts should turn towards the more pleasant and festive scenes of their native hills.

"Oh, that we had a fiddle!" at length some one exclaimed.

"Well," said a young farmer from Brattleboro, "I believe, boys, that I can make you a fiddle."

He had never attempted anything of the kind in his life."

"Can you?" shouted the boys. "Good! you can make one, and we will send to Washington for the strings."

George M. Colt, of Company C, 2d Vermont Volunteers, was the one who proposed to make the cheer-giving instrument, and with one hatchet, one jack-knife, an old file and a piece of a junk bottle as his only tools, he got a piece of soft maple that grew on the banks of the Rappahannock, and set to work. The bottom and side rim of the fiddle are made out of one single piece of maple, in the most approved style and form of the ordinary fiddle. It is a complete dug-out. The top is made of pine, which grew in the country. The bow is of maple, the same as the large part of the shell. The hairs were pulled from the tail of Col. Walbridge's white horse. The glue, some member of the company happened to have with him. And thus, in the course of some five weeks, the instrument was completed. After having been wistfully eyed by the men of the company and regiment for a long time, during its construction, the instrument at length gave forth its stirring strains.

Need we tell how one of their comrades was called out of the hospital to give it a trial—how he played for two hours until he was exhausted—how many stag dances it conjured up—to how many headquarters it went of nights in a round of serenades—how it was admired and cherished by the officers, and wondered at by that prince of tacticians and soldiers—General Getty—what a charm of other days in the Green Mountains it threw over the tedious, hard fare and hard duty in camp?

We will leave all these things to the imagination of the reader; and he can readily understand that the boys, instead of having a Fille du Regiment for their pet and favorite, had a Fiddle of the Regiment.

That fiddle is still extant, in all its native simplicity, without paint or varnish, just as it came from the maker's hands, and the writer of this notice has just come from an inspection of it. It is still in the possession of its maker, George M. Colt, in Brattleboro, who has been pretty severely dealt with by the war, having been wounded no less than five different battles. In the battle of the Wilderness, some two months after the fiddle was completed, he received a wound in the right arm, under which it has withered and stiffened for life.

But still the fiddle goes, and throws its charm over a pleasant household, of which one or two other veterans of the earlier regiments of Vermont form a part, and where the notes of a seraphine played by a young lady, mingle their harmony with its memory-stirring strains.

More unpretending heroes we have never seen, and a better-sounding fiddle has been seldom heard. But amid the joy and hilarity which its harmony awakens, methinks that there is a wail of death—the roar of battle in its sounds. What a glorious instrument to play "Old John Brown!"—made by one of our laboring men of Virginia timber from the banks of the Rappahannock, and consecrated by the blood of many battles!—Vermont Record.

BURKE AND BANCROFT.—The Round Table, in the course of a severe criticism on the weakness and bad taste of Mr. Bancroft's oration, remarks that its entire introduction is a reminiscence of Burke, and gives an example. "'The following is a well-known passage from Burke: 'If a great change is to be made in human affairs the minds of men will be fitted to it—the general opinions and feelings will draw that way. Every fear, every hope, will forward it; and then they who persist in opposing this mighty current in human affairs will appear rather to resist the decrees of Providence itself than the mere designs of men.' Bancroft's expression of the same idea is: 'When the hour strikes for a people or for mankind to pass into a new form of being, unseen hands draw the bolts from the gates of futurity; an all-subduing influence prepares the minds of men for the coming revolution; those who plan resistance find themselves in conflict with the will of Providence rather than with human devices.'"

HENRI GISQUET.

AN extraordinary man has departed life—Henri Gisquet, the famous Prefect of Police here, while Vidocq was at the head of the secret police under him. He rose from poverty and obscurity. His father vegetated on the Franco-Germau frontier with no revenue but the paltry pay of a custom-house guard. Hc quitted his home in his sixteenth year and came up to Paris to build a fortuue—his ambition then probably reckoned a few thousand dollars a fortune.

Fortuue led him by the hand, for he came up from his humble home under the protection of the Duke de Larochefoucauld, whose name opened to him the doors of the banking-house of Messrs. Perier. It put him in possession of the fulcrum which was to move the world, although the fulcrum was but the stool of a copying clerk. Talents require but the humblest iustruments to enable them to reach their euds. A twelve-mouth had not rolled away before his salary was raised from six hundred to twelve hundred francs. In four years he was head book-keeper of the great firm—the first servant in a bank, and but nineteen years old! He was in the habit of going to the office every Sunday morning (although the bank was closed on that day) to review the proceedings of the week.

One Sunday morning, Casimir Perier (who was destined a few years later to win immortal fame as a statesman) entered the counting-room in great anxiety. He had received letters from London announcing the critical situation of an eminent banking firm. He feared the failure would prove a heavy blow to his own cstablishment, and he was eager to learn the state of their account current. Henri Gisquet, without opening a book or referring to any memorandum, instantly told his master the exact condition of their account, and entered iuto details which satisfied Casimir Perier his apprehensions were gronndless. The latter was amazed. Thinking chance had no inconsiderable share in this accuracy and retentiveness of memory—the account referred to was probably the last account balanced—he plied youug Gisquet with questions about the accounts of all the correspondents of the firm. The answers given were as ready and as accurate as the first. Casimir Perier, who was extremely rough of manners, especially to those below him, grew angry and said: "This is a comedy gotten up by you to give fictitious value to your services. 'Tis impossible you can be so familiar with all the transactions of the firm as you pretend to be." Henry Gisquet had no small quautity of cayenne pepper in his blood. He opened his books, showed Casimir Perier account after account, and closing them said: "If you think I am a comedian, I leave your office." Casimir Perier held out his hand, then held out his arms to the lad, and from that time forth they were devoted friends, until Casimir Perier fell from the Premier's place in Francc, a victim of the cholera.

A year or two after this young Gisquet quitted the Periers' service, went to Havre, and with a friend opeued a banking and commission office. He was there only six months when Casimir Perier wrote him a pressing letter to beg him to resume relations with them. He represented his firm as exceedingly embarrassed and threatened with bankruptcy. Gisquet returned, examined the affairs of the Periers' bank, saw Casimir Perier had exaggerated the dangers which beset it, and restored order and confidence. Casimir Perier's brother died the following year, and Gisquet was admitted as a partner and he received power to sign the firm's name.

A few yeai's subsequently, Casimir Perier's younger brother grew to manhood, and Gisquet saw his partuer desired to place this young man at the head of the establishment. Gisquet with great delicacy withdrew and founded a bank in his own name. He had a capital of a hundred thousaud dollars. Casimir Perier was so grateful for Gisquet's past services and for his delicacy, he offered to become his partner, and became interested in Gisquet's bank to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars.

Gisquet prospered, aud when the Revolution of July occurred he was one of the wealthy men of Paris. His intimate relations with Casimir Perier made him one of the active agents of the revolutiou.

Casimir Perier appointed him Prefect of Police, and as long as Perier lived he continued in this office; he held it during Count de Montalivit's ministry, and resigned office when Count Molé succeeded to the Premiership. He was made Commander of the Legion of Honor and Councillor of State.

He was elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies and joined the Opposition. He proved a most annoying adversary. The ministry determined to effect his ruin. During the earlier months of the Monarchy of July, while the government were afraid the Revolution might be made a pretext for an invasion of France and the restoration of the Bourbons, Marshal Gerard, who was then Minister of War, sent Gisquet to England to purchase five hundred thousand stands of arms. He partly succeeded, but on his return he was disavowed by the Minister, as it was said, for want of money. A few weeks afterwards the arms purchased were accepted by the government, but they required extensive repairs, which Gisquet was obliged to pay. The Molé ministry seized this old story and made one of their supporters in the press charge Gisquet with defrauding the government. Gisquet sued the paper for libel. The jury found the newspaper guilty. The court, under pressure of the government, sentenced the editor to pay the nominal damage of twenty cents.

Gisquet felt that such a victory was defeat. He quitted political life forever. He left France and travelled for three years in the East, and upon his return wrote a book of travels which displayed great ability. He lived in the provinces for some years and then returned to live at St. Denin, where he had a valuable oil refinery.

Gisquet was fond of company and the pleasures of the table, could turn a song neatly enough to win him admittance to the Caveau, was generous (at his death he had above two hundred thousand lent out to friends without interest,) and had many warm friends. He was seventy-five years old at his death.—"Spiridion," in the Boston Gazette.

A FRAGMENT.

BY LAURA PRESTON.

A MAIDEN stood on the yellow sands
Anear to the waters blue,
And cried aloud to the gallant ship
That came sailing withiu her view:
"Oh ship, from across the stormy sea!
What treasure rare hast thou brought to me?"

Through the trumpet lond the answer came,
To the maiden's hopeful cry:
"Oh maiden, I've brought from 'cross the main,
Rich silks of every dye!"
Then she drooped her head full mournfully,
And said: "Is that all thou hast for me?"

Nearer the ship to her haveu sailed
As the answer came full loud:
"I have brought thee gems that sparkled once
On the arms of Sultanas proud!"
But sighs on the air fell dolefully,
As she moaned, "Is that all thou hast for me?"

Then, outspake the trumpet-voice once more:
"I have brought thee laces rare,
From looms as deft as the spiders use
For the castles they weave in air!"
But the maiden murmured sorrowfully,
Oh, ship! is that all thou hast for me?"

"I have brought thee fragile toys, inlaid
With spiced wood, and pearl, and gold,
They are filled with perfumes far more sweet
Than opening roses unfold!"
But the maiden cried in agony:
"Ah! Is this all thou hast brought to me?"

Then were silent all till the ship drew near
The yellow sands and the maid,
When a voice rose clear o'er the wind and wave,
And these were the words it said:
"What could the ship have brought to thee,
That thou wouldst have welcomed thankfully?"

Then swift the sigh on the maideu's lip
Was changed to a joyous cry—
And what sweeter welcome could she give
To the ship a-drawing nigh?
As she prayed, "On the ship may a blessing lie
That hath brought my loved one back to me!"

THE reputation of Byron, which has declined in England as that of Wordsworth has advanced, is still an eminent one in France, where the theatrical element of his genius is strongly sympathized with, and where one of his earliest admirers and latest followers, Lamartiuc, has been for some time engaged on the not easy task of writing his life. The last of the many reports in relation to the work was, that the Marchioness de Boissy, better or worse known as the Countess Guiccioli, had placed Byron's letters to herself in the hands of Lamartine, to be used at discretion, a quality, by the way, which he never possessed. It is a canard, which Lamartine is said to have set afloat himself, with what truth we know not, and by which he has certainly profitted, if only by the advertisement which it has given to his forthcoming volume. So, at least, the Marchioness de Boissy has asserted, and declared that she held Byron's correspondence sacred, and intended to keep it secret—a laudable intention, which she is now violating for a number of imaginable reasons, one of which may be to anticipate Lamartine, whose facts are frequently drawn from his fancy. At any rate, she is preparing a memoir, a biographical essay, or something of the kind, from which great things are expected. How the Marquis de Boissy, a whimsical and irate French Senator, who, in wedding Byron's chére amie, more than wedded his dislike of England, views the biographical project, we are left to conjecture. An American or Englishman would hardly care to see his spouse writing the life of his predecessor, but in France, we suppose, they have changed all that.

"You young rascal," said the old gentleman to the rash little boy in the street, "if that cab had run over you, where would yon have been now?" And the boy answered, "Up behind, a takiu' of the number!"

RIGHT AND MIGHT.

SOON after midnight on the 5th of March, 1866, a special train left Easton station (England) upon a strangely exceptional errand. More than a hundred skilled workmen and laborers, marshalled by gaugers, contracters and agents, took their seats in it in orderly fashion, but with a mysterious and determined air, as if some more than usually weighty business were on hand. One carriage was devoted to stout tools and implements, and the train, thus freighted, reached Tring at 1:30 in the morning. A procession was formed at the station—each man shouldering a crowbar or other implement—and a compact phalaux, one hundred and twenty strong, marched out, two and two, into the Berkhampstead Common, nearest to Ashbridge park, the seat of Earl Brownlow; and the objects of the expedition were then first made known to the rank and file. The greater portion of this common, occupying a space some two miles in length and from three-quarters of a mile to a mile and a-half broad, was enclosed a fortnight ago by Earl Brownlow; and we learn that Augustus Smith, of the Scilly Islands, as the owner of an estate near, and therefore as a commoner acting in concert with his neighbors, had determined to test his lordship's right to this course in a very practical way. The whole of the iron railiugs, consisting of stout "uprights," five feet high, and with broad metal bands at close intervals between each, were to be thrown down before daylight, Mr. Smith and the commoners taking all responsibility, chartering the train, and engaging the men. These last were told off in detachments a dozen strong; the substantial jonts of the railings were first looseued by hammers and chisels, and the crowbars did the rest. Before six o'clock in the morning the whole of the enclosure was levelled to the ground; each stout upright having the metal bands, its tributaries, first neatly folded round it, aud then being laid upon the turf it had recently served to close in. It was seven o'clock before the alarm was given, and by the time Mr. Paxton, the late Sir Joseph Paxton's brother, and Earl Brownlow's steward, appeared upon the scene, Berkhampstead Common was enclosed no longer. It was too late to do more than protest agaiust the alleged trespass, and this was energetically done.

Meanwhile the news spread, and the inhabitants of the adjacent village and district flocked upon the scene. In carriages, gigs, dog-carts, and on foot, gentlemen, shopkeepers, husbandmen, women, and children, at once tested the reality of what they saw by strolling over and squatting on the common, and cutting and taking away morsels of gorse, to prove, as they said, "the place was their own again." The cost of the three miles of iron railing removed is said to have been more than a thousand pounds, and that of its removal must have been considerable. Whatever may be the result of this daring return to what is called "old constitutional form," aud however it may be viewed by the legal authorities before whom it will be speedily brought, it must be regarded as one of the most decided and vigorous protests against alleged usurpation which have occurred in our own prosaic, peaceful, and order-loving times.—London Daily News.

THE PRICE OF PAPER.—There is one respect in which the value of paper has kept close to that of the precious metals since the commencement of the late war, and that is in regard to the price demanded by the manufacturers of the plain article, and which printers and publishers have been forced to pay, while all other commodities sympathize with the change in the currency and decline with the price of gold. Paper is as dear now that gold has fallen to one hundred and twenty-four, as when it stood at two hundred and fifty. It is impossible that this should be the result of natural causes, and it can only be attributed to the scale of import duties, which excludes foreign competition and allows our manufacturers to charge what they please. Since the commencement of the war, they have had everything their own way. Notwithstanding the vast profits realized, the cost of machinery, and the instrumentalities used in the manufacture of paper, and the large resources required to conduct the business, prevented capital from seeking such an iuvestment, especially as the state of things existing could not be considered permanent. Hence the price has been maintained at an exorbitant figure and in defiance of the ordinary laws of trade. But for the action of Congress in taxing paper and all the ingredients used in its composition to such an extent as to amount to prohibition of its importatiou, this imposition on the public could not have been practiced. Iustead of discriminating in favor of the agencies of education and intelligence, Congress seemed to make an exception against them, and loaded paper with heavier duties than any other article of commerce. It is time the error was rectified, and that the door was thrown opeu to competition.—N. Y. Sunday Mercury.

EPITAPH ON DR. JOHNSON.

HERE lies poor Johnson. Reader have a care,
Tread lighily, lest you rouse a sleeping bear.
Religious, moral, generous, and humane
He was, but self-conceited, rude, and vain.
Ill-bred and over-bearing in dispute,
A scholar and a Christian, yet a brute.
Would you know all his wisdom and his folly,
His actions, sayings, mirth, and melancholy?
Boswell and Thrale, retailers of his wit,
Will tell you how he wrote, and talk'd, and spit.

FEMALE DRESS.

WE trust that the dignity of our paper will not be compromised by a refereuce to the subject which forms the head of this article. The renowned Toufelsdröckh has wisely said, that "Society is founded on cloth;" and when we recur to the fact that the heaviest payments under the revenue laws are made for personal adornments, and that the highest efforts of man's inventive faculty are directed to an increase of the mechanical power of our looms, we will even then but imperfectly comprehend the importance of the question of dress. Carlyle, in his quaint way, says, that "we thatch ourselves over with the dead fleeces of sheep, the bark of vegetables, the entrails of worms, the hides of oxen and seals, and walk abroad a moving Rag-screen, overheaped with shreds and tatters raked from the charnel-house of Nature." This love of decoration is so deeply implanted within us, that, so long as we are constituted as we are, dress will hold its present predominating influence over us. This taste is very natural, and its indulgence, under reasonable restrictions, quite harmless. We have in our mind now, that Fashion is rapidly treading on the domain of common decency, and is educating our Misses into an utter disregard of that modesty which is at once the highest honor, as it is the most excellent and winning charm, of the sex. The tendency of modern taste in dress is the exposure and embellishment of those portions of a woman which it is the office and effort of modesty to conceal; it is "Completed to the taste

conceived and made up to cater to the worst passions of our nature. The advertisements which daily appear in the papers of London, Paris and New York contain at once a history of the demoralization which Fashion produces, and a satire on the prevalent impostures of the day. When we say impostures, we mean the arts which invest the calves with an amplitude nature never conferred, enamelling the skin, billowing the bosom, etc. The laboratory of Perpignan, to which Pelham escaped, is a common place for expedients now-a-days. It has been said, that during the past winter the number of female skaters was greater by an hundred per cent. than it had been at any previous season, owing exclusively to the invention of a certain method which, of spindle-shanks, made rounded legs; and so enamored passionate manhood, who clustered the skating-ponds like bees where all is honey.

It seems, too, that as the parlor skate is a delightful simulation of the winter pastime, so are the tilting hoops a clever process by which artfully fatted limbs can be disclosed on our thoroughfares. Go to the streets when you please, and you will find that, even under the ordinary conditions of a windless day, these slanting hoops allow a man's eyes to glance at will from sole to knee-pan. They do not rise to an altitude of development where the observer can gratify the full appetite, but, with a rare mechanical excellence or adroitness on the part of the wearer, they are contrived on the now-you-see-it and now-you-don't plan—thus delicately stimulating one as oysters do the stomach. We have noticed that these hoops are generally worn here by young women whose age supposes the finest development of person—for we really don't believe that false calves are generally used here, although it is pretty well known that in view of the exhibition these hoops make, embroidered garters, clasped with gold, are used. Not in badinage do we thus speak of these hoops, but seriously considering them inconsistent with a high quality of virtue and decency. We cannot believe that many of those who wear them really know the extent of the exposure they cause; and when we thus allude to them ex cathedra, it is because we consider them as indecent. Such improprieties of costume we regard as fair subjects for editorial criticism and animadversion.

For many years the pulpit has preached against the immoral tendencies of the stage—its dulling the moral sensibilities—its physical exposures and indelicacies of sentiment. This is all very well when applied to certain spectacles, but it is not true as a rule of general application. And yet, if these Reverends will stand for a half hour at the doors of their own churches, they will see more devils under these hoops, and hear more ribaldry from the observers, than Hinckley caused in Le Pied de Mouton.

LATEST FROM OREGON.

TO the superficial observer, Portland, Oregon, would not seem to be exactly the locality where we should look for an exhaustive, æsthetic criticism, or profound and authoritative reviews of public men and manners. But he who would rashly conclude that its productions were confined entirely to apples, cider, butter, eggs, and cheese, would do himself and that remarkable locality a great wrong. He would read the letter of "An Occasional Correspondent" in the Bulletin of the 20th instant, wherein the manners, personnel, and genius of the late Thomas Starr King and the Rev. Horatio Stebbins are comparatively reviewed, with feelings of admiration and awe. If he considered that portion relating to Mr. King as somewhat old in subject, though certainly novel in conception, he would remember that the seasons are later in Oregon, that "Spring comes slowly up this way," and that critical string-beans and literary asparagus only mature there when they have elsewhere gone to seed.

The Occasional Correspondent informs us that he has only met Mr. Stebbins casually, and that he has heard two of his sermons. How often he has seen Mr. King he does not tell us, but, from the context, it is fair to presume that his acquaintance with the late distinguished orator was even more formal and less intimate. This circumstance, which might interfere with criticism elsewhere exercises no restraint on the critical faculty of a Portland correspondent. He finds that Mr. King and Mr. Stebbins are both representatives of "Boston Theology and Philosophy," whatever that local epithet may signify. He further finds that Mr. Stebbins "impressed you with an idea of country freshness, purity and modesty," while King didn't. On the contrary, King had "the blasé look of an habitue of the common walks and crowded thoroughfares of a great city." "In style," continues this Portland Coryphæus, "Mr. Stebbins is less florid and pretentious than King" (a florid style and pretentious manner being, we presume, a peculiarity of the "habitues" of large cities) and that Stebbins is more "compact," "cultivated," and has a "finer fibre," "and a richer and more thorough culture"—which everybody knows is only found in the bucolic mind, and is part of the rustic character.

We reject the hypothesis that our Occasional Correspondent in his extraordinary criticism was guilty of any offence more serious than that absurdity into which provincial criticism is so apt to fall. The attitude of the critic or oracle of a small town is at once fascinating and dangerous, and nothing is more natural than for him to be betrayed into obtruding into broader fields those prejudices and opinions which have passed unchallenged at home. The worst enemy of the late Mr. King certainly never accused him of a "blasé presence;" Copperhead vituperation wasted its energy in epithets ridiculing his homely, rustic air, his boyishness, his "greenness." His biographers and critics in the East—numbering among them such names as Bellows, Whipple, Bryant, Beecher, Holmes, Whittier, etc.—have given testimony, as one voice, to this singular freshness, youthfulness, and modesty of his manner and demeanor, and the strange contrast between the spirituality, refinement, and cultivation of his intellect, and his simple, rustic, and unostentatious exterior. The Oregon criticism of King's style is another matter. That the author of Substance and Show, The Laws of Disorder, and Socrates, etc., should be deemed inferior in cultivation and refinement to the reverend gentleman who is taken to task for likening the cross to an American flagstaff, and the Declaration of Independence to the Sermon on the Mount, is unfortunate—for the critic. There is but one excuse for the opinion of an Occasional Correspondent, and it presupposes a condition of things and a contingency so improbable and startling that we hardly dare to offer it. It may be that Mr. King in appearance was considered "blasé" and "cityfied" for Portland, Oregon, but this involves that region in a degree of rusticity and bucolic simplicity which we shudder to contemplate.

H. D. DUNN, of this city, has opened the way for an exhibition of Californian products at Washington, which, if duly appreciated and seconded by our wine growers and farmers, must prove of great benefit to the State. In the Bulletin, recently, we observe three letters from Isaac Newton, Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture, acknowledging the receipt from Mr. Dunn of various packages of wines, seeds, nuts, oranges and lemons, all of which were appropriately "tested," and with highly gratifying results. The Commissioner pays Mr. Dunn the compliment of a request that he prepare an article on the "Resources of California," for publication in the next Annual Report of the Department. We regret that want of space precludes full publication of the correspondence, and of the proposal of our public-spirited townsman. We will, however, state, that Mr. D. offers to see that samples of wines and braudies forwarded to him prior to May 15th (pre-paid.) shall be sent to Washington. A portion will be placed on exhibition in the Agricultural Department Museum; the remainder, after being analyzed and tested, will be reported upon through the public press of the East, and in the publications of the Department of Agriculture.

SHREDS AND PATCHES.

THIS chill evening shuts me up with my books. When the "bairns" are in bed and the house quiet, while the rain whispers to me from the roof and sings lyrics against the window-panes, I find the last new book, or sit dreamily before the fire, looking into the long-ago.

Last night I spent with Atalanta in Calydon, having somewhat wearied myself with the Mutual Friend—the improbabilities of its plot, and scarce comprehending the necessity of so many dramatis personæ. But this Atalanta is a remarkable composition, at once full of brilliant imagery and golden-worded wisdom. To me it is the cleverest of contemporary classics, and at this moment, regarding the austere form of its expression—its adherence to the antique type of structure and illustration—I cannot recall its superior in any composition since Shelly. Besides, in these days, when Literature wears rouge, and expresses itself so sensuously and meritriciously, it is refreshing to find so sweet and pure a type of ideal beauty—through all of which the Psyche gleams—as in the book in question.

This drama and Story's "Cleopatra" are the two poems of this decade, and yet how opposite they are in all the higher qualities of metrical composition! The one is a dream of a breast palpitating under the fierce influences of a lascivious sun, and the other a stately picture of demi-god life, and the austere march of Fate in its fulfilment of inexorable decree. Each is true to its ideal, and absolutely perfect as pictures of the different relations they describe. The one would have warmed

"With delight
The Mænad and the Bassarid," while the other would have won a garland of wild olive at the Olympic Games.

And, speaking of books not absolutely new, but placarded yet in book stalls. I will say that, a week ago, I went steadily and thoughtfully through Kane's Love-Life, reading it all, and then, with the gas turned down, I looked into the hot coals and thought of it, and how

"For wise men as for fools,
Love is one thing—an evil thing, and turns
Choice words and wisdom into fire and air."

When one remembers the heroism of Kane's Arctic search, its boldness of resolution and execution, and the really brilliant narrative of all he saw and did, the portraiture he leaves of himself in the Love-Life challenges inquiry as to the authenticity of these letters. Could our explorer have so unheroed himself by a passion disreputable with the infirmities of a common nature? I doubt if the public will accept this Love-Life as an authentic record, so villainously calculated is it to upset our theories as to Kane's perfection of moral qualities. And yet

"Within the heart of every man are found an hundred swine."

I, who knew him well, who saw him in the abandon of his private life; who am, from such experience, familiar with his social and intellectual characteristics; intimate, I may say, with his inner life, don't doubt one word of these epistles. I see him in all of them—they are genuine beyond a question.

In spite of his declared contempt of the spiritual theory, he had a strongly-marked spiritual susceptibility, and even admitted that Heaven and its angels do manifest themselves sometimes to us, and pre-admonish us of danger and disaster. I have heard him refer to these possibilities more than once, and with serious sincerity.

It was this mystic constituent of his nature, strongly combined with Don Juanish propensities, that took him to the séances of the Fox girls. Once there, vis-à-vis to languishing, languorous eyes; in presence of the Priestess of a strong and perhaps real revelation: his double nature of intellect and passion strangely disturbed by the new faith and "the fair spirit, its minister," moved alike by his own superstition and "a dimpled chin, a neck of ivory," I wonder not that he surrendered himself to the fascination—that letters and professed Platonism followed. Kane was peculiarly susceptible; he had, in spite of his dedication of self to science and the solution of his Arctic-Franklin problems, a sentimentally sensual infirmity for women. He loved not as a satyr; he bore his love to cloud-land—out of reach of human eyes; he twined the doorposts with garlands, but the Priest was not allowed to enter; his sensuality gorged itself amid music and song—under the stars and the crystal gleam of running waters.

I believe that he had determined to elevate his protégée by a course of education; that he sought to place her in a position where she could fit herself for the demands of his own rank and class; and when she should be prepared intellectually, he might marry her. But as the public required the fullest particulars of Kane, Fox was made a subject of speculation in the papers as his possible wife; and so his family got wind of the amour, and determined to stop the disgrace of such a matrimonial connection. Our explorer had as much family dignity and pride as if he had been a Braganza, whose claims of lineage were older than heraldry itself; and as Kane was, so were all his blood. It was this argument of family which made him irresolute; which made him call her sister and friend

This weakness and pride are the key-notes to all the contradiction and antagonisms one finds in this Love-Life. What if she had been the creature of an imposture?—not hers the fault. No guilt could attach to her; he had rescued her from all impurity—he promised to educate her up to himself—in noble purposes and aims. If she were chaste, if he had trained her with the idea that she should be the companion of his life and fame; in the religion of whose purity his baser self would slip from him; if he had educated her as his equal, his manliness, his name, would have silenced all sneers, she would have been ennobled by her own chastity and her careful moral and intellectual discipline. When he placed her at school he told her and the one to whose care she had been confided, that she was being prepared for the position of his wife.

If this Love-Life is a let-down to him, what a deposition is hers; how it demeans her; how unworthy it proves her; how cold and calculating she seems! If she had had a warm worthy nature; if she had been lifted to his higher life; if she had a spark of womanliness, she would have died ere she had betrayed his heart and bared it to the sneers of the world. If he loved her—if he proposed, when health should come to him from the serene skies of the lovely island whither he went, to marry her—then it is better he passed away when he did.

And so, History—which deals with realisms, which does not from its austere heights reach down to the vales where we pipe our loves to poesy and dance, will not see the traces of this chapter of Kane's life. It will tell how heroically he encountered the snow and iceberg of the Arctic Sea, animated by his philanthropy to rescue the lost navigators and to extend the domain of human knowledge. When the Muse thus lifts him to the gaze of an admiring posterity, all memory of this Love-Life will be dead and lost in the grave of her who is even to-day disappearing from the public gaze.

SEEDLING PLANTS.

ONE of the greatest pleasures of the florist or amateur is the raising of plants from seed; and to aid those who have not yet tried this branch of gardening, the following hints are given: A great many persons, who do not understand the cultivation of the small-seeded and tender varieties of plants, complain of the bad growing qualities of the seeds they purchase, while the whole difficulty arises solely from bad management and improper planting. We have frequently heard of instances of many delicate seeds like the Calceolaria, Chincse Primrose, and such-like, having been sown in the open ground as grass seeds would be planted, and on another occasion found that a person had actually buried the seeds of this kind of plants to the depth of two inches. It does seem so strange that persons who pretend to have all their faculties, and pride themselves on their smartness, do not use their common sense and their observing and reasoning faculties when engaged in the operations of gardening, as well as anything else. The following remarks from the Loudon Gardener's Chronicle, the leading horticultural paper of Great Britain, are so appropriate under this heading, that we copy them entire:

"We all know how loud and ceaseless are the cries of gardeners, as well as amateurs, that the flower seeds they purchase will not grow. It never seems to occur to them, the complainants, that they themselves are the executioners, and the seeds their victims; and yet we are perfectly certain, from nearly a half-century's experience, that such is the case. Seeds of a plant inhabiting a dry country, with little winter's cold, and a genial, early, steady spring, are sowed in many places in the ground in March and April; there they lie in a most uncongenial soil, exposed to wet and cold. But the force of life is strong within them, Nature will have its way, germination begins some bright sunny day, after which comes an ice-cold dew at night, and the young embryo is rendered torpid. Nevertheless, weakened as it is, the succeeding day sees a renewed effort at growth, followed by renewed torpidity. The alternation of paralysis goes on for a little while, till at last the powers of Nature are exhausted, and the seeds expire. Now, these early efforts are out of sight, no eye watches the struggle, the seeds die while buried, and the seedsman is abused. Mignonette often affords a striking example of this. Although a native of the hot, sandy regions of North Africa, where it is a hardy little bush, it ripens its seeds in our northern latitude, but when the time for sowing them in the spring comes, they are cast carelessly upon the ground, and they perish.

"Then come complaints: 'Mr. Seedsman,' exclaims the gentle Lucy Bell, who is devoted to flowers and has been looking forward to the delights a charming bed of Mignonette which will not come, 'it is very tiresome, indeed, that your seeds will not grow—it is really quite shameful!'—and then she sees in some of the frames and pots near by a great quantity of beautiful specimens of this plant from four to six inches high and as close as quills on a hedgehog. 'Why, look there, I declare you have sold me the bad seed and kept the good yourself!' 'Madam, I assure you that I have but one sort of seed, of which you had a part.' 'Well, it is most extraordinary.' At last she purchases as many pots as she requires, but at the same time remains perfectly convinced that she was cheated in her seed—not in the least inclined to blame herself for having destroyed the lives she thought to cherish."

One of the chief pleasures of plant growing is, that it induces reflection. If we get seeds, what are they? Where is their native country, and what are its peculiarities? By imitating these conditions as nearly as possible, we can grow the plants, and then, by a gradual acclimating, improve and adapt them to almost any locality or circumstances, as well as human beings and animals are by the same process.

Let us observe the plants growing naturally: how they reproduce themselves by their seeds; how they are planted—at what season of the year, in an exposed or sheltered position; in what aspect—east, west, north or south; dry or moist soil. The history of a single plant, observed and studied out in this way, would prove of more real value to the true lover of plants than all the scientific disquisitions ever written. The pretended plant-lover would grow everything, but the real appreciator of them finds more than he can fathom even in a few kinds: just as in literature, some have wandered through everything which has been written, and come out empty-handed, while others have reaped as they went along.

Beyond question some seeds are bad, and will not grow with all the care and attention which may be bestowed upon them, but the fault far oftener lies in the manner and time of planting.

Seeds, to germinate well, want a warm, moist atmosphere. This can be attained in many ways. Those who only grow them in pots will find the process much more successful if the pot in which they are planted is placed either in another pot a size or two larger and filled in between with earth or moss, or plunged in the ground with a piece of glass laid over the top of the pot, which prevents the moisture from evaporating and thus equalizes the temperature. A small wooden box is also an excellent article in which to sow seed. If sown in the garden, a nice little arrangement, when pots are not to be had, is to place four or more bricks on edge, forming a square in which the seed may be sown; with a glass laid on them a great deal of heat will be retained, and, in many kinds of seeds, germination very materially hastened.

When seeds are sown the soil should be fine and well moistened. After scattering them evenly over the surface, they should be covered with soil to about the same thickness as the seeds themselves; then press this down firmly, which will exclude the air and bring the seed in immediate contact with the soil, which is warm and moist. Many kinds of seeds are greatly benefitted by soaking in warm water before planting. It has been found by experiment that seeds sown under blue glass will germinate in a few days, while under the plain it may be weeks and months before they make their appearance above the ground.

RHYMES AND REASON.—"Kings," said Byron, "are not more imperative than rhymes." Mr. Anson G. Chester offers a forcible example of this truth, in a poem now going the rounds of the press, written about a dead captain who was buried in his own garden. Captains undoubtedly have a right to be buried anywhere they please, and certainly the captain's noble exception to the standing rule to be buried "where he fell," was deserving of lyric enthusiasm. But Mr. Chester tells us that the battle

> "Was fought with fiendish mania
> On the field of Spottsylvania."

Fiendish mania is good. We are not aware that it is intended to express anything in particular more than an euphonious resemblance to Spottsylvania; yet it is good. It shows that Mr. Chester is not a man to stop at difficulties. He would have told us of > ——the foe's hallucination

> In the fight at Jones' Station; or,

> ——the hypochondriasis
> Of the foe in other places, and we should be thankful that it is no worse. Verily the captain sleeps well who is moved thus; and nothing, not even Mr. Chester's poetry, can touch him further.

THE Odd Fellows of this city and vicinity celebrated the forty-seventh anniversary of the introduction of the Order into the United States, by a picnic at the People's Park, San Mateo, on Thursday last. About 7,000 persons participated in the festivities.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE Opera House company played the Flowers of the Forest at the Academy of Music on Monday and Tuesday evenings. On Wednesday evening Lost in London was brought out in a most praiseworthy manner. Stage manager Graves has added a new chaplet to his managerial laurels by producing a play perfect on its first representation—we are almost lost in wonder when we think of it. The drama is a decided addition to the dramatic literature of the day, and is worthy of all the care that may have been given to its rehearsal and production. It is ably constructed, with strong contrast of characters, and bears throughout the evidence of the vigorous intellect of its author—Watts Phillips. Charley Thorne in the part of the Cornwall miner, "Job Armroyd," made another decided hit, only excelled by his personation of "Hawkshaw" the detective, in the Ticket of-Leave Man. His conception, dialect, dress, and rendition of the character was capital. Courtaine, too, brought out the best points in the part of "Gilbert Featherstone," a man of the world, with a grace and finish characteristic of him. Jackson made a good tiger as "Blinker," (who is a rough swell and a great admirer of the "Manly Art of Self-Defence") though over-acting a little. Mrs. Harry Jackson's "Tilly Dragglethorpe," a rough country lass, and a character companion to the Cornwall miner, was ably assumed. Mrs. Sophie Edwin as "Nellie Armroyd," had a very difficult character to perform successfully, and the weakest "prominent" character in the piece, though in the pathetic scenes she was very effective, and succeeded in making the part an interesting as well as affecting one. The scenes of the "Darksome Mine" and the "Snow-storm," are very natural and effective, and the whole play is so happily produced and cast as to be one of unusual interest. It will be given for the matinée this afternoon, and for to-night's performance; and should run through all next week if it achieve its deserts.

The Metropolitan opened for a new season on Wednesday evening, with T. J. D. De Voe's original, historical drama, entitled Ireland Shall Be Free, as the attraction. The piece was produced to a good house, and was placed on the stage in an excellent manner, under the supervision of stage manager Dowling. It evidently had been carefully rehearsed, for its first representation was almost entirely free from those halts and imperfections that so often mar the production of a new play.

The old Arrah-na-Pogue company, who form most of the staple of the present one, were each warmly received as they appeared. Thompson, as "McGoon," the spy, made his part the leading one, and gave it that peculiar individuality for which he is noted. Messrs. Pauncefort, Beatty, Leach, and Brown, made the most of their parts. Mrs. Sedley Brown, as "Maggie McDonald," only appears in the last act, in which the scene and principal characters are both transported to Australia, and does what little she has to do very feelingly and gracefully. Miss Belle Divine acted an Ophelia-like mad scene in the second act very effectively. The "Widow Quinn" of Miss Frances Gass was good J. H. O'Neil and Mrs. Meyers danced a jig dance in excellent style. The peasant gathering and dance in the first act, and the conflict between a body of peasantry and the red-coats in the second act, were particularly effective and well managed.

Though we cannot award high credit to the colloquial or dramatic merits of the play, yet its quick action, numerous accessories of peasantry, soldiers, dances and songs, and warm sentiments of national patriotism—in a Fenian point of view—all tend to the conclusion that it will be a successful one, and achieve quite a run. Friday evening the same piece was played, and it is announced for this afternoon and evening.

"Here we are again, Mr. Merryman!" The Cosmopolitan Circus, under the management of Messrs. Lee & Ryland, will open at the old locality on Jackson street, between Kearny and Montgomery, on Thursday evening next. The Buisley family—who remain with us until the steamer of the 10th of May—are engaged to appear in their incomparable feats. The Lee and Siegrist families are also announced as members of the troupe—so it will evidently be a family circus in more respects than one. Alexander, the veteran circus agent, announces elsewhere in our columns that this coming circus will open with a new pavillion, supplied with all the modern conveniences, and with as good an equestrian, gymnastic and acrobatic company as ever appeared here.

The second subscription entertainment of the Edwin Forrest Dramatic Association will be given at Turn-Verein Hall on Tuesday evening next.

It is rumored that the Metropolitan Theatre will pass into the hands of Mrs. Sedley Brown, some time next week, who will hereafter hold the reins managerial.

A FAIR for the benefit of St. Bridget's Church will be held at the new hall, corner of Polk and Pacific streets, commencing Tuesday, May 1st.

Every holder of a share will be entitled to a portion of the Company's lands, having the privilege to settle thereon and participate in all the advantages and profits of the enterprise, and special privileges granted to this Company by an Imperial Decree of Maximilian, dated 9th January, 1866, without being subjected to the conditions of regular Government emigrants, this Company settling upon their own lands, secured by private purchase, and held under indisputable Spanish titles.

Shareholders becoming actual settlers will also have the privilege of any employment upon the Company's plantation. Portions of land will be allotted to settlers, to be held by them until a final division makes it their property.

For the purpose of increasing the value of the Company's land, and to create all the comforts of a home and society, it is the intention of the company to form a regular settlement and to lay out a town adjoining their present plantation into building lots, which will likewise be fairly divided between the 8,000 shares which comprise the total number of the company.

A large number of shareholders will settle upon the company's lands after the rainy season in October next. Many of them may then be employed by the company, or by others able to plant for themselves, or in developing the mineral resources of the adjoining mountains, etc., etc.

Men of all trades and professions, desiring to emigrate to Mexico, will have great advantages as shareholders of this company. They will find the lands already purchased for them at a rate equivalent to a free gift, to be held by each shareholder as his property, protected by the best Spanish titles, and the good will of all political parties now contending for the reins of government; the climate the most salubrious, and the land rich and fertile beyond description; every kind of game abounding; the rivers full of fish and with extensive beds of large oysters; altogether, a country where it is easy to procure a livelihood and the comforts of a home with less labor and less capital than in any other part of the world.

The extensive placer diggings, veins of silver, and solid quartz ledges, which are to be found in the immediate vicinity, and acknowledged to be rich and very extensive, can, by the presence of a number of settlers, be profitably developed. Many of these mines are to be found within the limits of the company's grant. The Sierra Madre or Mother Mountain of Mexico, situated only within about twenty miles from the coast, can be reached and developed with much greater facility than the more remote mines in the interior, and will therefore make the company's lands the most desirable to locate upon.

For Maps and Survey, and further information, apply at the office of the MEXICAN SEA ISLAND COTTON CO., Betge's Book Store, Russ House, Montgomery street, between the hours of 11 and 1 o'clock.

☞ All the assessable stock having been taken up by mutual subscription of stockholders, the company will have no more shares to offer after the limited number of unassessable shares have been placed, and shall prefer to sell these to actual settlers—a single share of which will be sufficient to entitle them to a large portion of the lands.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED shareholders in the Mexican Sea Island Cotton Company, having investigated and satisfied ourselves of the importance of the enterprise, recommend the same to the public. We are convinced that under the management of the present officers of the company, with their efforts to induce industrious parties to locate upon the land, that the enterprise must become very profitable to all parties interested, and most beneficial to actual settlers.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S
Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these
LIFE-GIVING PILLS!
Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be
A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,
For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever
AN ETERNAL SPRING!
It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.
THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES
Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—
FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS
Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest
VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.
They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.
FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS
And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills
Invariably cure the following diseases:

M. Howard's Hair Restorative,
NO. 315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract.
The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but,
HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION,
we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

A GERMAN ATHLETIC FESTIVAL.

THE great characteristic of the Germans, as a people, is their nationality. The love of the Fatherland is the ruling émotion which in everything nerves and inspires Germans to fresh endeavors; and this trait we fiud in them wherever they are, whether members of a small fraternity in a foreign land, or of a great nation in their own country. A German never forgets that he is a German, and that those of his nation, with whom he is thrown in contact, are his brethren. And it is in great measure, I think, this feeling which leads Germans to establish and maintain associations of all kinds; associations for the cultivation of music, of gymnastics, and various other pursuits; associations whose members are ever ready to obey the call of the parent association in the Fatherland, and to assemble from all parts of the world to do honor to one of the fetes held by the parent society. An instance of this occurred last year, at the time of the Singers' Festival at Dresden, when upwards of thirty thousand Germans flocked from America, Australia, and other distant lands, to attend a festival which lasted but three days, many of them leaving Germany again as soon as the fete was over.

I was never more struck with German enthusiasm than when, in the course of last long vacation, I was fortunate enough to be present at two German Turn Fests, or Athletic Festivals, the one at Darmstadt, the other at Freiburg. I think it may interest some of your readers, who are now looking forward to the third anniversary of our greatest English athletic meeting, to read even a brief account of what they can do, and are doing, in a similar way on the other side of the Channel, though much that I would gladly relate cannot be condensed into the space of so short a notice.

These Festivals do not appear to be regularly held at the same towns, nor on any fixed days; but they take place annually, and are celebrated in turn at most of the principal towns in Germany. On these occasions about four acres of ground are specially enclosed, and gymnastic apparatus, of which more hereafter, are erected temporarily; for although there are always two or three gymnasiums in every German town, yet these would be quite inadequate to provide accommodation for the vast numbers who, as competitors or spectators, frequent these popular gatherings.

It is worthy of note that any idea of gain or profit is quite foreign to these gatherings; the expense incurred in preparing the ground is very great, and the prizes are merely nominal, every one contending out of pure love for the honor and glory of these contests. In many cases the victors are only crowned; in none are their rewards of any substantial value. The ground was circular, and surrounded by gayly decorated booths and tents, provided for the refreshment of the wearied spectator, or competitor, for I need not remark that the Germans do nothing without beer. Round the circumference of an inner circle were arranged eight sets of apparatus, each consisting of two fixed parallel bars, about four feet out of the ground; a movable horizontal bar, and apparatus for high jumping, and that curious-looking machine —familiar to every German, but comparatively strange to most English athletes—called the "horse," which consists of a padded body about four feet long, raised on four adjusting legs, with two ribs, a foot apart, running transversely across the body of the horse, each six inches from the centre. In the middle of the ground were erected poles and ropes for climbing, trapezes and ladders, among which were scattered rough rocks of unhewn stone, weights, and dumb-bells.

The festivals always commence on a Sunday, when those of the competitors who have already arrived at the town, march in procession to the largest available building, where they partake of a midday meal, and afterwards are addressed by one of the leading men of the fete.

The Sunday afternoon is spent in practicing for the coming struggle; for it is not until the Monday that the actual contests commence. By that time many more competitors and spectators have arrived, the town wears its holiday garb, the streets are thronged with crowds of holiday-makers, among whom the neat gay dress of the competitors is everywhere distinguishable. The ground itself is early beset by those who are anxious to secure the best places for witnessing the various contests.

The proceedings commence by dividing the competitors into squads, or companies, of about twenty or thirty members, each squad being then placed under the command of three officially-appointed judges, who lead them away to that particular competition which they are directed or choose first to attempt. The programme included running high jump, running broad jump, putting the weight, exercises on the bars and horse, and foot-racing. I cannot do better than take you, as I went myself, from one exercise to the other, and tell you in which they seemed to equal, surpass, or fall short of our standard. But here I must note a feature peculiar to these competitions, that every competitor who is desirous of obtaining a prize must reach a certain standard in every exercise, so many points being allowed for each, according to merit, and the winners of the greatest number of points in the aggregate being declared victors. This system I believe might with advantage be introduced into England, where individual excellence is much more highly valued and rewarded than general proficiency. Here a man must be Cæsar aut nihil in every contest he undertakes; for the moderate performer in a great many contests is quite unrecognized.

First, then, we looked on at the running high jump. The competitors jumped from a sloping board two feet square, and raised about two inches in front. This board had not much spring in it; but still it presented incomparable advantages over the turf from which we learn to spring. The style of jumping was decidedly bad; they all went at it too fast, and were very weak about the legs, having great difficulty in clearing the rope cleanly. They all jumped fairly well up to four feet ten inches; but few cleared the five feet. The best man in each company cleared about five feet two and a half inches, which may be considered equal to five feet from the grass itself. There were very few "naturally" good jumpers; all used more or less effort; and what struck me very much was, that they all jumped exactly in the same style. This I afterwards attributed to the fact that Germans always learn to jump or run, etc., in classes, several being taught by the same master; and as every exercise is performed by rule, the same rules prevail universally, and lead to uniformity in style.

The best broad jumpers covered about seventeen feet and six inches, though very few sixteen feet fairly; there was a great want of that power about the hips and thighs so essential to excellence in this exercise, nor did they lift themselves enough at the commencement of the jump. In fact, I saw few, if any, who could get well over fourteen feet of water, with a three feet hurdle on the take-off side of it.

From the broad jumping we adjourned to putting the stone; and were surprised to find that they put a rough piece of stone, fresh from the quarry, which seemed to me to be much more unwieldy than the shot of weight with which we practice. Among the heavier men were some very fine putters, equal to any I have ever seen; they put a stone which, from a rough guess, must have been over nineteen pounds, from thirty-five to thirty-eight feet; but the winners in this class were, as a rule, large, powerful men, and not small men of great muscular development, as we not unfrequently see in competitions of the kind in England.

The gymnastic feats on the bars and horse formed the next event; and we followed the squad we had watched all the day, and with whom were now quite friendly—having drained cups of wine together, and conversed as to the prospects of the success of each competitor. In these gymnastic feats the judges first set a qualification exercise; one of their number —in this case a well-knit, English-looking man—performing it with great grace and ease. This exercise was designed to test strength as well as activity, and all the competitors followed in turn, each doing his best, but one failed out of thirty. They all seemed thoroughly at home in these exercises; and the only distinction between their feats was the degree of neatness and ease with which they were executed. After qualifying in this manner, each competitor was at liberty to perform two exercises of his own choosing, and were marked by the judges according to their respective merits. It was very astonishing to me to see so many men, of all weights and ages, adepts of this kind of exercises, which were remarkable as displaying great strength in the muscles of the back and arms. In these feats they would have as far surpassed any set of Englishmen of equal numbers, as Englishmen would have excelled them in the running and jumping competitions. By far the greater number of those who competed could perform easily feats which none but the most practiced in England could achieve without great efforts.

The foot-racing, I must confess, much disappointed me; they ran two at a time, ninety-three yards out and ninety-three yards home, turning round two posts three yards apart. They showed no style, and, in but very few instances, any pace. The best time I saw done by any out of two hundred competitors was twenty-four and a half seconds for the one hundred and eighty-six yards; and many were twenty-eight or twenty-nine seconds. They had none of the "springy" or elastic action of a good sprint runner, but a short, slouching style of going, such as one sees in a man quite out of condition after he has run three hundred yards.

Gladly, when the long series of foot-races were over, we turned to the horse (Pferd,) and watched with interest the feats thereon performed. The contest was carried on on the same principles as those described before at the bars; and the feats themselves consisted chiefly of some difficult vaulting feats, and twisting the body between, round, and over the hands, which firmly grasped the projecting ribs. My companions and I attempted several, but found them very difficult, though they evidently required more knack than strength.

At the close of this contest we were compelled to leave, so that we did not witness the ceremony of crowning the victors.

Throughout the whole of these games I was astonished at seeing so very few uniformly well-developed men; in many cases there was a wonderful development of particular muscles, but in very few the symmetry arising from active exercise in youth. But throughout there was the German spirit of enthusiasm and fellow-feeling, infusing such life into the whole proceedings as one never sees among others than Germans—a spirit quite different from the clamorous partisanship which the impulsive English nature adopts, but a more quiet, peculiar method of taking the whole as part of the duty of every German.

THE EMPRESS' BALL.

[The late ball given by the Empress at the Tuileries, is thus pleasantly described in "Spiridion's" letter to the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.]

BUT let me describe these brilliant scenes to you. The Empress had taken particular pains to make her ball as agreeable as possible. In the first place it was her ball and not a State ball. Being her ball, the list of invitations was limited; it included only people known to each other, and who were the habitual guests at her "Mondays." She gives a dancing party every Monday when, besides her own suite of rooms, the only state room thrown open is the Salon du Premier Consul, which is used for dancing. The guests of these "Mondays" enter the palace by the private door, which is near the Pavillon de Flore. The state entrance is the centre of the palace, in what is called the Pavillon de l'Horologe. Readers who have visited the Tuileries will remember they entered the palace by the great door in the centre of the line of buildings between the court-yard and garden; at this door there is a carriage-way between the former and the latter. Visitors mount the state staircase and visit the saloons, and leave the palace by the staircase near the Pavillon de Flore. This is known as the Empress's staircase. It was by this staircase the guests reached the fancy ball.

The Empress took for the model of her costume a celebrated full length portrait of Marie Antoinette by Lebrun. In this picture she is represented as dressed in the height of the prevailing fashions of that day, attired in red velvet and white satin, trimmed with furs and embroidered with gold, and wearing a head-dress several feet high, powdered and trimmed with ribbons.

The Princess de Hohenzollern was dressed in the mediæval costume of a German baronness, which, I may add, she quit as soon as she could in decorum, and disguised herself in a domino and mask. The Princess Mathilde wore a domino. The Princess de Metternich was dressed in the purest fashions of Louis XIV.'s reign; every article of her toilet—shoes, dress, bonnet—was made of pale yellow taffetas; she wore a high, powdered head-dress and carried a long cane covered with white velvet; the handle of the cane was studded with diamonds. The Princess Rimsky Korsakow was dressed very much like the Empress; the only difference in her dress was that the satin as well as the velvet were red colored, and her embroidery was of silver and not of gold. The Duchess de Colonna was dressed in Louis XVI.'s costume; her whole costume was made of white velvet; she was of course powdered, and carried a white velvet stick. Barouness Alphonse de Rothschild was attired precisely like the Duchess de Colonna, but her costume literally blazed with diamonds. The Duchess de Rivas likewise wore a Louis XVI.'s costume, but it was made of black velvet and black satin embroidered with jet and diamonds. The Marchionness de Gallilet wore the costume of the Exterminating Angel. She carried a steel sword in her hand, a polished metal on her brow a gold cuirass on her breast, and wore her hair streaming over her shoulders. Mme. Lacave Laplagne wore the costume of the Angel of Darkness, which Mons. Gustave Dore drew for her. The Princess Jean Troubetzhoi was in the Devil's costume: her dress was of black and flame colors, and she wore black wings in her back.

Mme. Jules de Saux (so well known as an artist under her pseudonym, Henriette Brown) was in the costume of a Chinese lady; the Countess de Castiglione wore a long dress of black velvet and powdered hair—nothing else! Mme. Erlanger was in Fine Weather, and her sister, Miss Slidell, was in Rain. The Emperor wore a black dress coat, white cravat, short breeches, black silk stockings, the grand cordon of the Legion of Honor and the Venetian mantle. The Imperial Prince wore a costume of Neapolitan fisherman copied from the costume worn by Mario in the second act of the Ballo in Maschera. The Prince de Hohenzollern was dressed like the Emperor: in truth, almost every gentleman wore the Venetian mantle.

Among the beauties of the ball—for you may easily believe I have not mentioned the hundredth part of them in the foregoing list—was Mlle. Alice Robin, a beauty who combined that chaste, affectionate, honest beauty of the English girl with French grace and piquant airiness. Her mother was an English opera dancer of great beauty, her father was a Frenchman of considerable wealth and good position, who, attracted by the English danseuse's qualities, wooed and married her. Mlle. Alice Robin was attired in an Italian costume which set off her beauty to great advantage. Although there was nothing of a crowd at leaving the ball, and consequently no waiting in the entrance hall, swept by draughts of cold air, she was chilled in going from the ball-room to her carriage; and all the way home she shivered. She grew rapidly worse during the night, and, despite every effort of the attendant physicians, died three days after the ball!

To retain the bloom and freshness of youth unimpaired, the ladies should use that harmless and fragrant toilet article, Davidson's Circassian Bloom, for the complexion and skin. Sold by all druggists.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

CONCORD WAGONS AND HARNESS.—The Pacific Concord Carriage Manufactory is prepared to supply the Pacific Coast with Concord wagons and harness made to order. The members comprising this firm have long been in the employ of the celebrated manufacturing house of L. Downing & Son, Concord, New Hampshire; so that parties wishing Concord wagons or harness can obtain just the same quality of article here and save 25 per cent. on their purchase money. We have seen some of their workmanship, and can recommend it to the public Address Belduke & Co., 820 Folsom street, between Fourth and Fifth.—San Francisco Leader.

DAINTY WORK.—About the daintiest work we ever saw were specimens of hair jewelry at the establishment of Mrs. C. Cook, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, yesterday. This lady manufactures all sorts of jewelry—watch-chains, earrings, finger rings, breastpins, and various other kinds of ornaments—from human hair. We witnessed the process of manufacture, and it is intricate and ingenious in the highest degree.—S. F. Examiner.

WANTED—Agents to sell, by subscription only the most popular work ever written: "GRANT AND SHERMAN; their Campaigns and Generals." By the world renowned historian, Hon. J. T. The people want Headley's illustrated "GRANT AND SHERMAN," etc. For terms and territory, address E. E. SHEAR, No. 8 Montgomery Street, and Box 1,430, San Francisco, California

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend. JOSEPH SPARROW.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

NIGHT SWEATS, AND PULMONARY DISEASES.

Read the following:

REMARKABLE CURE.

San Francisco, September 5th, 1865.

I desire to make known the fact that I was afflicted with a very bad cough for fifteen years, and, during this time, used everything which I could hear of without getting the better of my disease, until I tried Dr. D. B. Vincent's Cold Preventative or Cough Mixture, which cured me sound and well.

NEWTON MOORE.

This is to certify that my wife has been troubled with indigestion for nearly eighteen months, and, by using one bottle of Dr. Vincent's medicine, has been completely cured.

San Francisco, April 6th, 1866.

JOHNSON J. THOMAS.

San Francisco, July 17th, 1865.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats, and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much better; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

JOHN O'NEILL, National Hotel.

The above named diseases nearly all originate from the same or similar causes, and will cure all of them. It is a sure cure for Dyspepsia. Price, 50 cents per bottle.

THE COLD PREVENTIVE

[For the Californian.]

INCOMPLETENESS.

THERE'S a dim dell—all mine own;
Never there hath sunbeam shone:
On the pure leaves of my lily
Hang the dews—all white and still'y.

There are roses—but in name,
For they never blush nor flame;
Folded is their sweetest sweetness—
They will never know completeness.

There, the linnet on the thorn,
Warbles at the early morn;
But the nightingale's song-blossom
Throbs and dies within its bosom.

EMILIE LAWSON.

THE CLIFF HOUSE AND THE SEA LIONS.

[C. H. W., ("Inigo,") the San Francisco correspondent of the New York Times, sketches the Cliff House and the habits of the Sea Lions, as follows:]

HAVE you ever heard of the Cliff and the Cliff House? You should have, for Bierstadt sketches them, and Ludlow promised to devote a chapter of his book to them. It is situated on the cliffs, about six miles distant from the city, at the termination of the Point Lobos Road—a turnpike. The road is made of a species of red rock, and is smooth as a dollar, the only fault being that in dry weather it is rather hard for horses' feet. At any stable in town you can get a pair of horses that will carry you out there in a half hour, and my first drive was behind a livery team that brought three of us and a rockaway in twenty-four minutes. Great place this for teams and turnouts. You can scare up several pairs on livery that will trot in 2:45 to the pole.

The Cliff House is a comfortable verandahed little hotel, perched up like a lookout-box on the summit of the Cliff. The view seaward from its balcony is unbroken. Far in the distance, on clear days, you can see the Farralone Islands, the intervening space dotted with the white sails of commerce. A few rods from the shore lie the seal-rocks. These are the curiosities of the coast. Though called seal-rocks, they are, in reality, tenanted by sea-lions. You perhaps remember the fellow at Barnum's Museum, who was kept in a tank of sea-water, and would flounder out and in, chiefly distinguished by his inordinate love of fish, a number of domestic virtues, and a bad breath. Well, these chaps are exactly like him, and they cover the rocks. More comical-looking creatures you never saw. Sometimes they lie three deep, floundering over each other, and cutting amphibious pigeon-wings in the awkwardest way imagiuable. In the water they are most at home, and by the aid of the field-glass which, secured by an immense ring and chain (a sad commentary upon metropolitan morals) is kept for the use of visitors, you can become very well versed in the mysteries of submarine bridal chambers. They are "musical cusses," too, their voices being chiefly on the heavy baritone order; of them it may be emphatically written that their bark is on the sea. Eminently conventional, they have some of the funniest ceremonies that can be imagined. Whenever a new comer lands on the rock the youngest and fairest of the occupants go down to welcome him. Owing to an unfortunate shortness of reach but little embracing or hugging is done, but they make it all up in kissing, rubbing their noses together sometimes for half an hour at a time. In their promenades along the rock they don't walk arm-in-arm at all, but they keep patting each other on the back with their fins, and dealing out such other tokens of esteem as manifest to all around that they are on the most friendly terms. There is one which has been christened "General Butler," a cock-eyed old fellow, with a lower jaw twisted askew, and a voice like a boatswain's. He is in favor of severe measures on all occasions, and confiscates everything within his reach. But he is bold as a lion—id est, as a sea-lion—and when the heavy nor'west blows come, and the sea rolls in with a roar like thunder, dashing the spray over the top-gallant rocks until it flies far inland like snow-flakes, and making the house and the cliffs upon which it is built tremble to their deep foundations—then it is, when all the weak ones crawl to the leeward of the rock, and lie prostrate in trembling and fear, that my Gen. Butler takes the weather side. Heaving his great head and shoulders out in relief against the stormy sky, he emulates the bull of Phalaris in his roarings, till the elements sometimes feel their impotence, and for the moment become dumb. His harem watch him with wondering and admiring eyes, and occasionally one of them struggles up to cheer him in his loneliness, but no! The hirsute Mars repels the advances of the equally hairy Venus, and back she slinks, shamefaced and rebuffed, among the others of the sea-raglio. The outgoing steamers sometimes pass so near these rocks that a biscuit could be thrown from their decks upon them; but I fancy the seals are not very fond of biscuits, for they flounder off into the tide water without even taking a nibble. Between these rocks and the Farralones the seals make regular trips, like mail steamers. Fish and bird-eggs constitute their chief diet, but I do not know that they would turn disdainfully from a young bird if it fell in their way. Birds'-nesting is a favorite sport with them, and they excel in it. No chamois hunter could go up the crags of Switzerland with more ease than they climb the jagged rocks, for all their short-leggedness. But I've an idea that the boobies and pelicans would flank them if they followed the fashion of land birds in nest building, for the most active seal would find it rather difficult, perhaps, to climb a tree.

The Cliff House is kept by one Foster, a right jolly fellow, and enjoys life as well as the next one—I might say better, for he is next the cemetery, and his nearest neighbors lie there. I may be wrong, but I don't think they have much fun. He is now talking about building a bridge from the house to the seal rocks, so that visitors can go out and fish upon it, and get a nearer view of his marine menagerie. But I've an idea that some mischievous fellow might go bobbing for seals, and, if he got Ben Butler on a string, there would be the devil to pay. Moreover, I do not think the seals, amiable as they are, would stand the invasion of their soil. For when the rope was put up for Cooke, the acrobat, to walk over upon, they indignantly deserted in a body and steered for the Farralones, and it was some time before they returned to their old haunts.

FLEXIBLE IVORY.—M. Charriere, a manufacturer of surgical instruments in Paris, has for some time been in the habit of rendering flexible the ivory which he uses in making tubes, probes, and other instruments. He avails himself of a fact which has long been known; that when bones are subjected to the action of hydrochloric acid, the phosphate of lime, which forms one of their component parts, is extracted, and thus bones retain their original form, and acquire great flexibility. M. Charriere, after giving to the pieces of ivory the required form and polish, steeps them in acid alone, or in acid partially diluted with water, and they thus become supple, flexible, elastic, and of a slightly yellowish color. In the course of drying, the ivory becomes hard and inflexible again; but its flexibility can be at once restored by wetting it either by surrounding it with a piece of wet linen, or by placing sponge in the cavities of the pieces. Some pieces of ivory have been kept in a flexible state in the acidulated water for a week, when they were neither changed nor injured

CULTIVATION OF FLOWERS.

SEEDLING PLANTS.—NUMBER TWO.

THERE are many no doubt, who would like to try their hands at raising seedling plants, but when they get a seedsman's catalogue to look over, they are completely bewildered by the multiplicity and variety of things which are recommended, and do not really know what to select, as all have some special qualification which renders them desirable and worthy of attention.

We will name a few, with their claims, which may enable the reader to select for cultivation. And here we will repeat the advice of one of the most celebrated gardeners of England on the purchase of seeds: "Get from the best and most reliable man the best seeds he has, and nothing but the best—quality, not quantity. Do not be afraid to pay him his price for a choice bit of seed; one fine plant will amply repay you for all you pay for it.

Ambronia umbellata, one of our California flowers which is scarcely known and yet in some localities growing very abundantly, is a charming plant with beautiful verbena-like heads of sweet-scented flowers. It is very effective in beds, rock-work, or in baskets suspended in a window or piazza. There is also a yellow-colored variety which has the delicate perfume of the jasmine These may be easily grown from the seeds, and will be highly prized by those who are true lovers of sweet-scented flowers; besides, another great recommendation, with many they are not common.

Acanthus Mollis. This plant claims our special interest, and no garden of any pretensions should be without a specimen. It is a stately and beautiful ornamental foliaged plant, from the leaf of which the capital of the Corinthian column is said to have been derived; grows freely in ordinary soil.

Gynerium Argenteum. This is the most magnificent ornamental grass in cultivation, producing numerous flower-stems, from seven to ten feet high, each surmounted by a noble plume of silvery inflorescence. When planted on a lawn, or in front of trees or shrubbery, where we can have a background, the effect is most imposing.

Ricinus, a magnificent and highly ornamental genus, the picturesque foliage and stately growth of which, combined with the brilliantly colored fruit of the giant varieties, impart to select plantations, shrubbery, and mixed flower-borders, quite an Oriental aspect. In the gardens about Paris, and at the Central Park, New York, they form one of the principal features of attraction; and, if planted out and grown as single specimens on our lawns and pleasure grounds, as an ornamental foliage plant, they would form a new and striking feature.

Zea Curagua is a valuable addition to the ornamental foliage plants, from Japan. It has the appearance of corn, but the foliage is beautifully striped, like the so-called ribbon-grass. It grows to the height of from five to six feet; the leaves are opposite, and from two to three inches wide, and often two to three feet long, striped with green and white, and frequently tinted with rose color.

Beta Brazilliensis. Robust, large-leaved plants, with terminal spreading heads of very picturesque leaf; blades, some having broad, silvery, central ribs, margined with green, and others with rosy, crimson and violet ribs, with similarly colored margins, admirably adapted for grouping and shrubbery.

Wigandia Caracasana. One of the finest ornamental foliage plants in cultivation, either for masses or single specimens, growing to the height of six feet.

The above are worthy of growing if only a single specimen, and will be of interest to any collection.

GONE.

I MISS thee! oh, I miss thee! Summer wanes:
Thou comest not to me; where art thou straying?
Lo! on the hillside Autumn's glory reigns,
And sobbing winds are through the dark pines playing.

So plains my saddened voice in tones of woe,
Aerial measures to earth's beauty chiming,
The under-current of whose mighty flow
Hath taught my soul to spend itself in rhyming.

And musing thus, I call upon thee, love:
I call in vain; and sadly, sadly sighing,
The hours are ling'ring full of burthened pain
For the lorn heart so passionately dying.

NEW YORK, March 28, 1866. L. S. D. L.

A LOST ART.

AMONG the many wrongs that I suffered during my school-time—a period which it is only the poets who venture to misrepresent as agreeable—I set down as the most mischievous this wrong, that my handwriting was ruined. The seminary at which I was a pupil was unfortunately a Classical or Fashionable one. No young gentleman was supposed to be in a position that so vulgar an accomplishment as caligraphy could possibly become necessary to him in after-life. If you gave them the ideas and a dictionary, there were few of us who had not the "faculty divine" of constructing Latin verses; but as for the hand in which they were transcribed—you might think it had been an ingenious effort of our little toes. In a school preparatory for Eton, however, such learning as how to write was no more to be expected than the art of book-keeping by double-entry, and therefore parents and guardians were not disappointed. Once in a term, indeed, we each indited an epistle to our friends at home, under the surveillance of Dr. Swishem and his crew of ushers; but it was felt on all hands to be a very unsuccessful affair. The composition, it is true, was elaborate and ornate, and about as unlike what a boy would write, if left to himself, as can be conceived:

MY DEAR [M. or P.]—I write to inform you that the school-term will be completed on the 29th inst., upon which day please make arrangements for sending for me, if you can conveniently. Dr. and Mrs. Swishem request me to convey to you their best compliments. Hoping you are in good health, I remain, dear [M. or P.,] your AFFECTIONATE SON.

It would not be credited how execrably those "holiday" letters" were permitted (in so fashionable a seminary) to smell of India-rubber. But the fact is, that not only had the parallel lines, without which our communications would have been more or less diagonal, to be rubbed out. but an immense amount of dirt, produced by tears, perspiration, jacket-cuffs, and other matters all incident to this tremendous ordeal; not to mention that half-a-dozen blades of penknives were used up in the work of erasures.

The delicate manner (we called it "gingerly") in which the second r in "arrangements" (omitted in the original) was inserted by the Doctor himself, in as good an imitation of the writer's own style as his sense of propriety would permit, and the final flourish in which the signature was enveloped, as at the conclusion of some pyrotechnic display, were efforts which would have excited our admiration, if a boy had such a tribute to give. They were really wonderful to us, most of whose native hieroglyphics would have defied the subtilty of Colonel Rawlinson or any other decipherer who had been only accustomed to deal with cuniform inscriptions. I say most of us, because some of us had been very respectable writers before we came to Dr. Swishem's, and owed our subsequent failure entirely to him and his system.

I myself, for instance, remember the time in my early boyhood when I could read with tolerable ease any sentence I had once written, no matter though forty-eight hours might have interveued; whereas, as an adult, such a feat has been utterly impossible. The learned sergeant in the Pickwick Papers, who is described as so indifferent a penman that his best efforts could only be read by his clerk, his moderate ones by himself, and his usual ones by neither, was yet better than I; for after a day and night have elapsed, I can make absolutely nothing of my own writing. It was a "Caligraphic Mystery" long before the Stereoscopic Company patented theirs; and were it not for my wife, to whom the gift of interpretation has been revealed, and who copies out all my manuscripts for the press, the general public would know nothing of their favorite author. But stay, I am anticipating. It was never supposed at Minerva Lodge that any pupil would subsequently so far degrade himself, and it, as to make a living by his pen. The possibility of such a misfortune—to do my revered master justice—never entered into the Doctor's brain. We were all country gentlemen's sons, and it was hoped that we should remain in that position of life in which it had pleased Providence to start us.

But even a country gentleman has sometimes to write an invitation, and even an Address to his Constituents, if he aspires to sit in St. Stephen's (and does not get it written by somebody else,) and therefore I contend that Dr. Swishem should have taught us how to write. Perhaps he imagined as the advocates of classical education maintain in the case of History, Geography, and the Modern Languages, that Writing is too contemptible a subject for the intellect of youth to grapple with, and may be safely left for subsequent acquisition. But, at all events, he need not have spoiled "the hands" of those who had hands. This, however, was effected most completely by his system of punishment by Impositions. If I was caught "out of bounds," or eating sausages in bed, or putting slate-pencil into a keyhole, or (worse than all) if nature, overburdened by an early dinner, gave way during the Doctor's sermon, and I fell asleep at church, there ensued an imposition; that is, I was compelled to copy out, from a classical author, a certain amount of lines, varying from a hundred to one thousand. In the case of a very flagrant outrage—swigging the Doctor's table ale upon the sly—by a depraved young gentleman, Maltworm minor, I have known an imposition of two thousand lines of the poet Virgil to be set in punishment.

There was not much in common between Dr. S. (who was a foolish little round man, given up to heraldry) and the bard of Mantua, but they were always hereby connected in our minds, and hated with equal rancor. How our fingers scurried over those odious hexameters, until they grew stiff and sore, and refused to form the letters! What strange inventions were made use of (though never patented) to shorten the cruel mechanical toil—surely almost as bad as the Crank of our model prisons—by tying half a dozen pens together, and imputing the vice of repetition where our author had never been suspected of it before.

In short, although of the positive results of my education at Minerva Lodge I have but little to boast (for I soon forgot how to compose Latin verses,) that little was more than balanced by the fact that my handwriting was utterly ruined by its Imposition system. Excessive speed was the only virtue which it nourished in the way of penmanship; we soon got to write "running hands." But as for the art of writing, as a means of communicating information to others, it lapsed altogether, and was lost from amongst us, as completely as the method of staining glass is said to have disappeared from the whole human family.

"Spirit-hands," to judge from the few specimens of the penmanship of the other world with which we have been favored, are not particularly adapted for "setting" copies, and, indeed, much remind me of the wanderings of a spider, recently escaped from an ink-pot; but "spirit-hands" are as copperplate specimens of caligraphy compared to my hand. To people who can't spell, a bad handwriting is some advantage; for in cases of doubt,—such as, whether the i or the e come first in Believe or Receive—they have only to make their customary scrawl, and the possible error becomes undiscoverable; but the nature of my profession has compelled me to acquire this accomplishment (no thanks to Dr. Swishem,) and I have rarely any occasion for concealment.

There was one person who discovered ground for congratulation upon this my shortcoming, and only one. He was a gentleman who lived a life of leisure, and he confessed that my letters gave him greater pleasure than those of other friends, because they "lasted him so long." The first day upon which he received one, he would discover, after half a dozen perusals, a glimmering of what was intended to be conveyed; the next day, some interesting detail would crop out; and by the end of a week, if some sentence did not emerge with a flash which altered the entire complexion of the affair, he found himself (with the assistance of his family, and any ingenious friend who happened to be enjoying his hospitality) in possession of all that I had wished to say. But this gentleman's case was an an exceptional one. When my wife was unable to copy my deathless works, the compositors murmured and rebelled. They only knew English, they said; not Sanscrit. My Essay on the Assyrian Bull, for instance, with some remarks on its Treatment under Rinderpest, as suggested by Nineveh "Friezes," cost my publisher seventy pounds in printer's charges for "erasures and alterations" alone. I am so ashamed of my own performance, that I dare not save my fingers by employing a "multiplying-machine," even for business-letters. My small children make me blush for my inferiority, when they show me their "pot-hooks and hangers," and I shall not easily forget that moment of embarrassment, when one of them, in the absence of her governess, asked me to set her "a copy." "Dear papa, please write me out a line of Rs." I could as easily have written down the genealogy of Pharaoh, king of Egypt. Even the two ingenious "blind men" at the post-office were unable to decipher me except by mutual consultation. My envelopes took ten times the period that other Illegibles did in passing through their hands. They doubtless puzzled over the efforts of all those who had, like myself, been educated at Minerva Lodge, but the profession of literature—the trade of the constant scribbler—had in my case so thoroughly completed the evil which Impositions had begun, that I was facile princeps among even them: the most infamous of all bad writers. Literature needs have no such effect as this, if the previous training has been good. Some foolish persons think it is a mark of genius to write ill, but this is a great mistake. I look over my own epistolary treasures, and see with shame how quite otherwise is the case.

Place aux dames. This neat little microscopic hand, every letter of which is legible, belongs to the authoress of Our Village; and these bold and well-formed lines are from the same fingers which wrote Deerbrook and the Crofton Boys.

This free and manly hand (the best I know) is that which set down the Domestic Annals of Scotland; and this, perhaps the next best, so firm, distinct, and yet so flowing, is the same which has moved mankind at will to tears and laughter, from the days of Pickwick until now. To judge by this bold running-hand, the Woman in White was no Dead Secret to the printer; and here is the clear legible work of those dead fingers which shall paint, alas! no more Col. Newcomes for us.

Had I possessed the genius of all these writers combined, I should yet have been as one who preaches in an unknown tongue, edifying no Reader (and least of all "the Reader" who is employed by the printer,) but for the fair Interpretess of whom I have spoken; and even she was useless to me in some things. There are letters which one cannot get one's wife to write for one; and my correspondents grew rebellious, and threatened to cut off all communication with one who gave them so much trouble. A business friend in the city, declaring that "my telegraph-hand was much better than my writing-hand," insisted upon hearing from me by the wires only. Finally, a "round-robin" was addressed to me from the members of my own family, requesting that I should take writing-lessons of a professor, and enclosing thirty shillings to defray his charges for the first six lessons. I make it a rule never—under any circumstances—to return people's money, and, at the same time, I am too well-principled not to apply what I receive to the purposes for which it is intended. At the age of forty-five, therefore, I began to learn that science which I had acquired at eight years old, and lost during my residence at Minerva Lodge.

"Impositions, eh?" remarked the Professor as soon as he set eyes upon a specimen of what the painters would call my "latest style."

"Yes," said I, "that was the beginning of it; but Literature was the finishing-school."

"Don't believe it, sir," returned he. "I have had hundreds of adult pupils, who all write like this—only certainly not quite so badly. Not one schoolboy out of ten who has been brought up on classical principles can write a legible hand. The head masters ought to be flogged all round."

"Or even where the boys are flogged," suggested I; but he didn't understand this allusion.

"You will require to take a dozen lessons instead of six, sir," continued he, severely.

And he spoke within the mark, for before I left his establishment, cured, I had to take eighteen. I consider that if the law of England was framed upon equitable principles, it would enable me to "recover" the sum of four pounds ten shillings from the executors of the late Dr. Swishem; but I need not say that such is not the case.

My friends, of course, with the exception of the Gentleman of Leisure, were delighted with the results attained; and the compositors who have the pleasure of setting up this paper can scarcely believe their eyes. But I am by no means altogether freed from the consequences of my late deformity (for that's the very word.) A most respectable tradesman, to whom I gave my first check after this wondrous change, was, upon presenting it in person at my banker's, at once taken into custody upon the charge of forgery. He has brought an action against the firm for defamation of character, and I am subpœnaed as a witness in the Central Criminal Court. My old check book will be there produced, and the signatures (?) contrasted with the way which I have recently acquired—including a beautiful flourish like an Eagle—of subscribing my name. It will not, therefore, be necessary to humiliate myself by further confessions, since, for the culmination of this sad history, readers may consult the public papers for themselves.

PARTIAL SYSTEMS OF EDUCATION.—Among the heathens, the Persians in the time of Cyrus considered the virtues, especially justice and gratitude, as the main object of education; among the Athenians, accomplishments in arts, sciences and letters were the end; and among the Spartans, obedience was the sole principle of instruction, because that would preserve the ascendency of the laws. Yet neither of these answered their designs. Persia acquired some of the milder virtues, but failed in strength and hardihood; Athens found that neither art nor science would prevail against depravity of morals; and Sparta found that it was not enough to secure obedience to laws without considering their nature and effect; Persia fell a victim to luxury, Athens to licentiousness, and Sparta to tyranny. Such are the lessons of antiquity, and its splendid wreck remains an example to warn us against the dangers of partial systems. But under the new light which the Christian system has thrown over the power and destiny of the soul, a different view has been taken of the end and means of education. We consider the object of education two-fold: One, to improve and strengthen the mind itself; the other, to endow it with whatever is valuable or auxiliary in the duties of life.

WHAT WAS IT?

MANY years ago—not much less, I am concerned to say, than fourscore—it fell, in the line of professional duty, to the lot of my uncle—great uncle, you understand—then a young officer of engineers, to visit, of all spots in the earth, the Shetland Isles. His journey, as stated in his note-book, from which this remarkable incident is taken, was connected with the intended restoration of Fort Charlotte—a work of Cromwell's day, intended for the protection of the port and town of Lerwick, but which came to considerable sorrow in the succeeding century, when a Dutch frigate, storm-stayed, devoted an autumn evening to knocking it about the ears of the half-dozen old gentlemen in infirm health who constituted the garrison.

On the evening that preceded his departure from Chatham, my uncle appears to have given a little supper of adieu, at which were present Captains Clavering and Dumpsey, Messieurs Chips, Bounce, and The Tourist.

Whether the last three gentlemen belonged to the service or not cannot be ascertained. The army-lists of that period have been searched in vain for their names, and we are driven to the conjecture that the sportiveness of intimate friendship may have reduced what was originally "Carpenter" to Chips, and supplied the other two gentlemen with titles adapted to their personal merits or peculiarities.

From my relative's memoranda of the overnight's conversation, it would seem to have taken, at times, a warning and apprehensive tone; at other times, to have been jocular, if not reckless. The wet blanket of the party was Dumpsey, whose expressions of condolence could hardly have been more solemn had my uncle been condemned to suffer at daybreak, with all the agreeable formalities at that time incident to high treason!

Chips appears to have followed the lead of Captain Dumpsey, and (if we may assign to him certain appalling incidents of the North Seas, to which my uncle has appended, as authority, "Ch.") with considerable effect. Mr. Bounce seems to have propounded more cheerful views, with especial allusion to the exciting sport his friend was likely to enjoy in those remote isles; while The Tourist has, to all appearance, limited himself to the duty of imparting to my uncle such local information as he was able to afford. In fact, so far as can be guessed, the conversation must have proceeded something in this fashion:

"Tell you what, old fellow," Dumpsey may have said, "going up to this place isn't exactly a hop across Cheapside. If there's any little matter of—of property, in which I can be serviceable as administrator, legatee, and so forth—after your—in the event of your remaining permanently within the Arctic circle—now, say so."

"Prut!—Pshaw!" probably said my uncle.

"The kraken fishery has been bad this year, they tell me," said Chips, quietly. "Otherwise your friend might have secured a specimen or two of the bottle-nosed whale, and moored them as breakwaters in the Irish Channel."

"He did nearly as well," returned the unabashed Bounce. "Bill was bobbing one day for a coalfish in rather deepish water—thousand fathoms or so—when there came a tug that almost pulled his boat under. Bill took several turns round a cleat, and, holding on, made signals to his sloop for assistance. Meanwhile, his boat, towed by thing he had hooked, set off on a little excursion to the Faro Islands; but a fresh breeze springing up, the sloop contrived to overhaul him, and secure the prize. What do you think it was? You'd never guess. A fine young sea-serpent, on his way to the fiords."

"I should, I confess, much like to learn, from rational sources," said Captain Clavering, "whether these accounts of mysterious monsters, seen, at long intervals, have any foundation of truth."

My uncle was disposed to believe they had. It was far from improbable that those wild and unfrequented sea-plains had become the final resort of those mighty specimens of animal life, which it seemed intended by their Creator should gradually disappear altogether. Indifference, the fear of ridicule and disbelief, the want of education, preventing a clear and detailed account—such, no doubt, had been among the causes tending to keep this matter in uncertainty. It was not long since that a portion of a sea-serpent, cast upon the Shetland shores, had been sent to London, and submitted to the inspection of a distinguished naturalist, who (the speaker believed) pronounced it a basking shark.

My relative's voyage must have been made under auspicious circumstances, since, notwithstanding a brief detention at Aberdeen, a heavy tossing in the miscalled "roost" of Sumburgh, and a dense fog as they approached Lerwick, the good ship dropped anchor in the last named port on the tenth day.

There were no inns, there are none now in Shetland, and my uncle took lodgings in the house of Mrs. Monilees, than whom, he observes, no woman ever less deserved her name. Living must have been cheap in those days, for Mrs. Monilees boarded, lodged, and washed her guest for eighteenpence a day, and declared she made a handsome profit of him; the only "lee" of which my uncle ever suspected her.

Fort Charlotte was not a work of any remarkable extent, and my uncle's survey and report of all the Dutch had left of her were very soon completed. His orders being to await an answering communication, which could scarcely be expected to arrive in less than a fortnight, abundant leisure was afforded for making excursions in the neighborhood, and he resolved that the first should be to the lovely bay and ruined castle of Scalloway.

It was then the custom—if it is not still—to walk out upon the moorland, catch the first pony you fancied, take him whither you would, and turn him loose when you'd done with him. Arming himself, therefore, with a bridle and pad, my uncle stepped upon the moor, and speedily captured a likely-looking shelty that had an air of pace. The pony seemed perfectly aware what was wanted of him; and, having hastily rubbed noses with a friend—as if requesting him to mention at home that he had been pressed by an obtrusive traveller, but hoped to have done with him, and be back to supper—at once trotted off without guidance towards Scalloway.

The day was fine overhead, but certain misty wreaths—the skirts, as my uncle conjectured, of an adjacent sea-fog—kept sweeping up the valley, crystalizing pilgrim and steed with a saltish fluid, and melting away into the blue.

It was on the lifting of one of these gauzy screens, that my uncle found that he had turned an angle in the road, and was within sight of the village of Scalloway, with its dismantled keep, memorial of the oppression of evil Pate Stewart, Earl of Orkney, hanged a century before, but still (as The Tourist would tell us, were he here) the Black Beast of Orkney and Shetland.

On a fine clear summer's day the coast scenery of this part is singularly beautiful. From the heights overlooking the picturesque harbor may be traced the blue outline of many of the hundred islands forming the Shetland Archipelago, while countless holms (the "holm," at low tide, is connected with the main) and islets, green with velvety sward, stud the rippling waters. Far to the westward—nearly twenty miles, I think—heaves up out of the ocean depths the mighty Fughloe, now Foula, Island—Agricola's "Ultima Thule"—whose threatening bounds the most daring mariner approaches with reluctance.

As my uncle expected, a mist was hanging to seaward, and shut out all the nearer holms and headlands. He therefore devoted the first half hour to a visit to the castle, being accompanied in his progress by four young ladies, carrying baskets of woollen-work, the produce of island industry, of which, he was sternly informed, it was the custom of every traveller of distinction to purchase about a ton.

The mist had by this time cleared considerably. Not a sail of any kind was visible on the calm blue sea, but so many coasting and fishing craft lay at anchor in the roadstead as to have all the appearance of a wind-bound fleet. Excepting when a small boat moved occasionally between ship and shore, complete inactivity appeared to prevail; and this was the more remarkable since the herring season was near its close, and my uncle was aware that on the opposite (the eastern) shore every hour of propitious weather was being turned to the best account.

Here, however, though there were many sailors and fishermen about the beach and quay, lounging, sleeping, or chatting in groups, there was clearly neither preparation nor thought of it. What made this state of things still more unaccountable was that the bay, even to my uncle's inexperienced eye, was absolutely alive with "shoals" of herring and mackerel, clouds of sea-fowl pursuing them and feasting at their will.

The goodwives, if, having their work in their hands, they did not partake of their husbands' idleness, certainly abetted it, since it seemed as if four-fifths of them had assembled on the shore and the little quay.

Curious to elucidate the mystery, my uncle drew near to a man who had just come ashore from a herring smack, and seemed to be its master, and with some difficulty, for the sea-going Shetlanders are neither polished nor communicative, drew him into conversation.

"Would it be possible?" he presently asked, "to visit Fughloe; and on what terms could a smack—the skipper's, for instance—be chartered for the purpose?"

"Fughloe!" repeated the man, with a grin on his bronzed features; "why, fifty pounds."

"Fifty what?" shouted my uncle. "For a four hours' sail?"

"You won't get one of us for less," said the man, sullenly, and probably in a different dialect from that into which my uncle has rendered it. "And I wouldn't tempt you to try it."

"You have done so well with the cod and the herrings this season, that money's no object, I suppose?"

The man's face grew dark.

"We have done bad," he said, "and we're doing worser."

"With miles of fish yonder waiting to jump into your nets?"

"Waiting to do what? Why, sir, they knows it just as well as we, perhaps better," was the oracular reply.

"Know what?"

"Eh! don't you know?" said the man, turning to my uncle; "so you're a stranger. Will you come a little way along o' me?" he added, in a tone meant to be civil. My uncle assented.

Passing the remaining cottages, from one of which the skipper procured his telescope, they ascended the nearest height, until they had opened a large portion of the bay towards the west. Then the man stopped, and extended his shaggy blue arm in a direction a little to the south of the now invisible Fughloe.

"The fog's shutting in again," he said; "but you look there, steady. That's what keeps us!"

My uncle did look steadily along the blue arm and the brown finger, till they ended in fog and sea; but in the latter, through the former, he fancied he could distinguish a low dark object belonging to neither, the precise nature of which was wholly indiscernible.

"Now you've got him, sir," said the man. "Take the glass."

My uncle did so, and directed a long and penetrating gaze at the mysterious object.

Twice he put down the glass, and twice, as if unsatisfied with his observation, raised it again to his eye.

"I see the—the islet—clearer now," he said, at last; "but—but—"

"I know what's a-puzzling you, sir," said the skipper. "You noticed, when we was standing below, that it was two hours' flood; and yet that little islet, as you call it, lifts higher and higher."

"True. It was little more than a-wash when I first made it out," said my uncle; "let me see if—" he put the glass to his eye. "Why, as I live, it has heaved up thirty feet at least within this minute! Can any rock—"

"There's three hundred fathom good between that rock and the bottom, sir," said the man, quietly. "It's a creature!"

"Good heavens, man! do you mean to tell me that object is a living thing?" exclaimed my uncle, aghast.

For answer, the man pointed towards it.

His fingers trembling with excitement, my uncle could not for a moment adjust the glass. When he did so, a farther change had taken place, and the dispersing mist afforded him for the first time a distinct and uninterrupted view.

At a distance from the nearest point of shore which my uncle's professional eye estimated at a league and a-half, there floated, or rather wallowed, in the sea a shapeless brownish mass, of whose dimensions it was impossible to form any conception whatever; for while at times it seemed to contract to the length of perhaps a hundred feet, with a breadth of half that measure, there were moments when, if the disturbance and displacement of the water might indicate movements of the same animal, its appalling proportions must have been measured by rods, poles, and furlongs!

Through the skipper's glass, which was an excellent one, my uncle observed that its height out of the water had diminished by nearly half; also, that clouds of sea-fowl were whirling and hovering about the weltering mass, though without, so far as he could distinguish, daring to settle upon it.

Fascinated by an object which seemed sent to rebuke his incredulity, in placing before his eyes this realization of what had been hitherto treated as fantastic dreams, my uncle continued to gaze, rooted to the spot, until the mist, in one of its perpetual changes, shut out the object altogether, when the skipper, touching his hat, made a movement to descend.

On their way back to the village, the seaman told my uncle that, about a week before, the bay of Scalloway, and indeed all the neighboring estuaries, had become suddenly filled with immense shoals of every description of fish, the take of herrings alone being such as to bid fair to more than compensate for the losses of the season. Three days before, while the bustle was at its height, the wind light from sou'-sou'-west, and smooth sea, a sealing-boat from Papa Stour, approaching Scalloway, had rounded Skelda Ness, and was running across the bay, when one of the crew gave notice of an extraordinary appearance, about a mile distant, on the weather bow. The next moment, a mighty globe of water, apparently many hundred yards in circuit, rose to the height of their sloop's mast, and, breaking off into huge billows, the thunder of which was heard for miles around, created a sea which, distant as was the vessel from the source of commotion, tossed her like an egg-shell.

Traditions of volcanic action are not unknown to the Shetland seamen. Imagining that a phenomenon of this kind was occurring, they at once bore up, and, having the wind free, rapidly increased their distance from the danger, while, in every direction, boats, partaking of their alarm, were seen scudding into port. The appalled seamen glanced back to seaward. The momentary storm had ceased, and the spray and mist raised by the breaking water subsiding, gave to view an enormous object rising, in a somewhat irregular form, many feet above the surface, and—unless the terror of the crew led them to exaggerate—not less than half a mile in extent.

"A rock thrown up," was their first idea. One look through the glass dispelled it. The object, whatever it might be, lived, moved, was rolling round—or, at all events, swinging—with a heavy lateral movement, like a vessel deeply laden, the outline changing every moment; while, at intervals, a mountainous wave, as if created by some gigantic "wallow," would topple over the smoother sea.

Dusk was closing in when the sealing-boat reached the quay. They had all been closer to the monstrous visitor than any, except one small craft—young Peter Magnus's—which had had to stand out to sea, but was now seen approaching. When she arrived, nearly the whole population was assembled, and assailed her crew with eager question. Peter looked grave and disturbed, ("A young fellow, I'm afeered, without much heart," said the skipper,) and seemed by no means sorry to set foot on shore.

"It's neither rock, nor wreck, nor whale, nor serpent, nor anything we know of here," was all that could be got from Peter, but one of his hands who had taken a steadier look at the creature, declared that it made intelligent movements; also, that, in rolling, it displayed its flanks, which were reddish brown, and covered with hunches as big as botheys, and things like stunted trees! Pressed as to its size, he thought t might be three-quarters to a mile round, but there was more below!

"Not many of us fishermen turned in that night," the skipper went on to say. "We were up and down to the beach continually; for, the night being still, we could hear the beast, and from its surging, and a thundering noise that might be his blowing, we thought he might be shifting his berth. And so he was; for at daybreak he worked to the east'ard, and has lain moored ever since where you saw. But we still hear him, and the swell he makes comes right up to our boats in the harbor. Why don't we venture out a mile or so? This is why. Because, if he's a quarter so big as they say—and, sir, I'm afeered to tell you what that is—supposin' he made up his mind to go down, he'd suck down a seventy-four, if she were within a mile of him. We're losing our bread, but we must bide his pleasure, or rather, God's, that sent him," concluded the honest skipper, "come what will on it."

"There is one chance for us," he presently added. "The Sapphire, surveying ship, is expected every day, and some think the captain wouldn't mind touching him up with his carronades; but when he sees what 't is, I don't think he'll consider it his booty."

They had reached the village during this conversation, and were approaching a group of persons engaged apparently in some dispute, when a young man burst out from the party, and, in a discomposed manner, was walking away. The skipper stopped him.

"Well, Peter, my lad, what's wrong now?"

"I think she's mad!" was Peter's doubtful answer, as he brushed back his hair impatiently from his hot, excited brow. He had handsome, but effeminate features, and seemed about twenty.

The skipper spoke a word or two with him apart, patted his shoulder, as if enforcing some advice, and rejoined my uncle.

"Young Magnus, my sister's son," he said. "A sweethearts' quarrel, sir, that's all. But she do try him sure! Ah, Leasha, Leasha!" he continued, shaking his head at a young woman who sat at work upon the gunwale of a boat, and appeared the centre of an admiring circle of both sexes, who stood, sat, or sprawled about her, as their fancy prompted. She was very handsome, haughty-looking for her station, and, at this moment, out of humor.

Though she could not hear the skipper's exclamation, she understood the gesture that accompanied it, and, smoothing her brow, appeared to stand on the defensive.

Young Magnus, who had returned to the circle, stepped forward.

"Now, Leasha," he said, "will you dare to say before my uncle what you did to me—yes, to me?" repeated the young man, striking his breast passionately.

The word was ill chosen. Leasha's spirit rose.

"Dare!" she said, in a suppressed voice. "You shall see," she said. "But remember, Mr. Edmonston," addressing my uncle's companion, "this has nothing to do with such as you. I said that, because a wrecked hull, or a raft of Norway timber, or, at worst, a helpless, dying monster of some sort is floating on our shores, we are not ashamed to skulk and starve in port. Not a boat will put out to take up the fish within half a mile of this beach,"—she stamped her bare and sinewy but well-formed foot upon it—"nor even venture near enough to discover what it is that has scared away your courage and reason. Shame on all such, I say, and shame again."

"You don't know what you are talking about, Leasha," said Edmonston. "We do. If there were not danger, I should not be here. I might be willing to risk my life, but not my ship, which, while God spares her, must be my son's and grandson's bread. You speak at random, girl, and Peter Magnus is no more to blame than the rest of us; less, perhaps," said the good-natured skipper, "for his boat is but a little thing. A 'wreck,' child? Who ever saw a rig with nine masts! 'Norway rafts?' Psha! Call it a sea-thing, you're nearer to the truth; but he's a bold seaman, and a precious fool to boot, that puts his craft near enough to ask whence he hails."

"I would do it if I were a man," cried the girl, beating her foot upon the ground. "And—and I will not say what I should think of the bold man that did it now."

Young Magnus colored to the temples, for the challenge was directed to him, but made no reply. There had stood, meanwhile, a little aloof from the group, a young fisherman, tall, athletic, and with a countenance that would have been handsome but for a depression of the nose, the result of an injury, and for a somewhat sullen and sinister expression, which was perhaps habitual to him. The words had not left Leasha's lips before he uncoiled his arms, which had been folded on his broad chest, and strode into the circle, saying, quietly:

"I will go."

"You'll not be such a fool, Gilbert Sinclair (Sinclair,)" said Edmonston.

"You'll see," said the other, in his short, sullen manner. "Some of you boys shove her off," pointing to his boat, "while I run up yonder."

He went to a cottage close at hand, and was back almost instantly, carrying something under his fishing-cap, and a gun. His boat was already in the water, and fifty dexterous hands busied in stepping the mast, setting the sails, and stowing the shingle-ballast. She was ready.

"Who's going with you, since you will go?" growled Edmonston.

"I've only room for one man living," said Sinclair, in his sinister way. "Now, I don't want to take advantage over Peter Magnus. Him, or none."

The young man stood irresolute for a moment, then, with one glance at Leasha, leaped into the boat. Sinclair pushed off eagerly.

"You have done well, girl," said Edmonston, sternly. "If either return alive, it will not be Peter Magnus."

"What—what do you mean?" exclaimed the girl, clutching his sleeve as he turned away.

"That Gilbert Sinclair is a treacherous, malignant devil, and at this moment mad with jealous—Stop—"

But Leasha had dashed down the beach.

"Peter! Peter!" she shrieked, "come back! For the love of Heaven—back! I must speak with you!"

"Too late!" replied Sinclair, with a grin. "Wait till he brings you what you want to know."

As the last word was uttered there was a splash astern. Magnus had leaped into the water.

"Ha, ha! coward!" roared Sinclair, as his boat shot into the fog.

Evening was now approaching, and my uncle, deeply interested, and resolved to see the adventure out, accepted the skipper's invitation to pass the night at his cottage. After taking some refreshment, they strolled out again upon the shore and quay. The mist was clearing, and the moon had risen. My uncle asked what his host imagined Sinclair proposed to do, expressing his doubts whether he intended anything but bravado.

Edmonston was not so sure of that. Ruffian as he was, with a spice of malice that made him the terror and aversion of the village, Sinclair was a perfect dare-devil in personal courage, and, his blood being now up, he was certain, if he returned at all, to bring back tidings of some description. The man's unlucky passion for Leasha (who was betrothed, Edmonston said, to his nephew) had been the cause of much uneasiness to the friends of both. "God pardon me if I misjudge the man," concluded Edmonston; "but if ever murder looked out of man's eye, it did from his when Peter jumped into his boat to-day."

By eleven o'clock the haze had lifted so much that the skipper proposed to ascend the height, and try if anything could be seen. The night was still as death, and, as they rose the hill, the soft rippling murmur of the sea barely reached their ears.

"I never knew him so quiet as this!" remarked Edmonston; "I take it, he's—"

Before he could finish, a sound compounded of rush and roar, so fearful and appalling that it can be likened to nothing but the sudden bursting of a dam which confined a pent-up sea, swooped from sea-ward, and seemed to shake the very rock on which they stood. There was a bellow of cavernous thunder, which seemed to reverberate through the distant isles: and, far out, a broad white curtain appeared to rise, blend with the dispersing fog, and move majestically towards the land.

"It's the surf! 'He has sounded,'" whispered Edmonston. "Listen—now!"

Perfect silence had succeeded the tumultuous roar, and again they heard nothing but the sough of the sea lapping the crags below. But, after the lapse of perhaps a minute, the hush was invaded by a soft, sibilating murmur, increasing to a mighty roar; and, with a crash like thunder, a billow—fifteen feet in height—fell headlong upon the rocky shore. It was followed by two or three more, each smaller than the preceding; and once again silence resumed her sway.

At daybreak it was seen that the terrible Sentinel of Scalloway had returned to his fathomless deeps.

And where was Sinclair? He was seen no more; but, weeks afterwards, a home-bound boat, passing near the spot where the monster had lain, nearly came in contact with some floating wreck. From certain singular appearances, some of which seemed to indicate that the wreck had been but recently released from the bottom, the crew were induced to take it in tow, and bring it into port. There it was at once identified as the forward portion of Gilbert Sinclair's boat, torn—or, as Scalloway men insist to this day, bitten—clean off, just forward of the mast—three grooves of one colossal tooth—the size of a tree—being distinctly visible!

There are persons, it is true, who have endeavored to lessen the mysterious interest of my uncle's story, by suggesting a different explanation—hinting, for example, that the object might have been composed of nothing more extraordinary than the entangled hulls of two large vessels, wrecked in collision; and that Sinclair, suspecting this, and endeavoring to reduce them to manageable proportions through the agency of gunpowder, had destroyed himself with them.

But, if so, where were the portions of wreck? We have have also the support of no less a person than the author of "Waverley," who, in his notes to the "Pirate," mentions the incident, and its effect upon the hardy seamen of Scalloway; while my uncle himself, at a subsequent visit to that port, smoked a pipe with Mr. Magnus in the very boat—then converted into an arbor—that had been bitten in two by the sea-monster. So that, with him, I frankly ask—if it was not a kraken—What was it?

DEMAND FOR MORE LIBERTY IN FRANCE.

M. THIERS, the eminent French historian and statesman, made a great speech in the French chambers, on the 26th of February, for an extension of liberty and free institutions in France. It is one of those speeches that may become a waymark in French history, if the public opinion of the nation is up to the tone of the orator. We quote a few of the striking things said by him:

"Since 1852, we have lived in the hope, founded on what seemed to be an assurance, that the concentration of power in the hands of the Emperor would only be temporary. The general feeling has been that as soon as calm should return, the institutions which the country had enjoyed at other times would be restored. This expectation was founded on the constitution itself, which can always be modified by the initiative of the Emperor, with the consent of the senate. It resulted from the memorable declaration of the 14th of January, 1852, that if liberty were not in the foundations of the edifice it would one day be its completion, and also from the decree of November 24, which re-established political discussion here. Encouraged by those acts and declarations, the nation looks wistfully for those institutions which the whole civilized world acknowledges alone capable of assuring liberty and security, and is naturally impatient to see them restored, now that the government itself every year acknowledges that the calm has returned. Hitherto the restoration of liberty was only a question of time, not one of principle, which it now seems to have become.

"When a nation founds a dynasty, it has not exhausted its rights, but is entitled to demand that its will shall be embodied in all the acts of the government. Thus monarchy in France, as throughout Europe, is founded on the principle of national sovereignty. The form of government may change, but public opinion ought ever to inspire the acts of the government, and must, therefore, have the means of forming itself. For this, certain liberties are necessary—first, individual liberty; then that of publicly expressing thought both by speech and by the press. Abuses of the press can only be properly repressed by moral means. That experiment has yet to be made. When will it be commenced? The citizen ought to be free not only in his person and thoughts, but also in his preferences, when called to elect his representative. It is highly improper for the government to designate candidates (interruption); and in employing, to ensure their triumph, the funds granted for the public service, it deviates from the path of rectitude.

"Real liberty is that which places a nation in possession of its own destinies. Decentralization is not liberty, or all the nations of the middle ages would have been free, for the royalty abandoned to them all local affairs. Free trade is not liberty; for Turkey has not a single protective duty, while the United States is the country the most attached to that system. Even universal suffrage, which is one of the means of liberty, is not liberty itself, for England has only a restricted suffrage, and certainly no one will say that England is not free. Which are the free nations? Which are those not free? We need not say. We must pain no one. Of the former, two may be mentioned as incontestably free: a monarchy and a republic—England and America."

QUESTION by the defendant's counsel: "Did my client enter into a positive agreement to marry you?" Answer: "Not exactly; but he courted me a good deal, and he told my sister Jane that he intended to marry into our family."

A CUP OF COFFEE.

WHEN a boy I had lessons in French of a Frenchwoman, whose husband was confectioner in the grand ducal kitchen at Darmstadt. One of the sons—he became afterwards a brave and distinguished officer—was a great crony of mine, and with him I often paid a visit to the said ducal kitchen, which for me was not merely a source of material enjoyment.

The steaming, roasting, and boiling which were going on there excited in me the greatest interest, and I could uninterruptedly watch the process of roasting a joint from the first, when it was put raw on the spit, till that consummating moment when the fire had imparted to it a rich brown covering and of sweetest savor.

I observed how the roast-veal was sprinkled with salt, the capons wrapped in slices of bacon ; nothing escaped my eager boyish attention.

Hence I have retained a taste for cooking, and in leisure hours occupy myself with the mysteries of the kitchen ; with the preparation of articles of human food, and all thereto belonging ; in which are not unfrequently included matters of which chemistry knows next to nothing.

Young chemists do not devote their attention to such things, inasmuch as they are little fitted to afford proof of their skill and ingenuity, or to found a claim to recognition in the domain of science. It therefore is left for the older ones to do so.

On the best method of preparing our common beverage, coffee, the opinions both of cooks and connoisseurs considerably diverge ; and the difficulty of a decision cannot fail to be appreciated by him who knows that our tinmen and other artificers are yearly adding to the improvement of the half-hundred biggins or coffee-pots which we already possess.

As my recipe for the preparation of coffee threatens to make all these inventions unnecessary, I risk, of course, making all manufacturers as such my adversaries.

I appeal, however, to the impartiality of those who drink my coffee, all of whom I hope to have on my side.

So much has already been written about the mental influence of tea and coffee upon our modern society and civilization, that it is useless to dwell on it more particularly here.

But this is certain, that Anne Boleyn must have risen from a breakfast of half a pound of bacon and a quart of beer (mentioned by her in one of her letters) with very different sensations as well as sentiments, from those she would have had, if the meal had consisted only of a cup of coffee or tea with some bread and butter and an egg.

I also pass over unnoticed the national economical importance of coffee, and will merely say a few words on the influence which coffee has had on modern warfare.

In the first Schleswig-Holstein and the last Italian campaign the introduction of coffee very materially contributed to improve the general health of the German and French soldier ; and I am assured (by Captain Pfeufer, of the Sanitary Commission in the Bavarian Army) that since the use of coffee in the Bavarian army as beverage for the men, the number of soldiers on a march unable to proceed has, in comparison with formerly, very considerably diminished—so much so, indeed, that sometimes not a man is ill ; and this too when the distances have been great and the weather unfavorable.

And Julius Frobel relates (Seven Years in Central America, page 226,) that for the men accompanying the great trading caravans in Central America, coffee is an indispensable necessity : " Brandy is only taken as a medicine, but coffee, on the contrary, is an indispensable article, and is drunk twice a day, and in large quantities. The refreshing and strengthening effect of the drink under great toil in heat and in cold, in rain or dry, is extraordinary "

As is well known, the English are masters in the preparation of tea. In preparing coffee, the Germans are—so they assert—greater adepts. It is certain that more coffee is drunk in Germany than tea.

The German savant especially prefers coffee to tea, which, perhaps, is because of his habits and of the different effect of the two beverages on the body.

Tea acts directly on the stomach, whose movements sometimes can be so much augmented by it, that strong tea, if taken fasting, inclines to vomiting.

Coffee, on the contrary, furthers the peristaltic movement downwards ; and, therefore, the German man of letters, more accustomed to a sitting life, looks on a cup of coffee, without milk, and assisted by a cigar, as a very acceptable means of assisting certain organic processes.

For the same reason, so it is said, Russian ladies have become patronesses of coffee and tobacco.

These remarks prove sufficiently that the preparation of a beverage possessing in the highest degree the above valuable qualities cannot be without interest.

I was originally led to my attempts in this matter by the intention to obtain an extract of coffee, which might be useful for travellers and for armies on a march ; and on this occasion I became aware of the influence which the atmosphere, or the oxygen in the atmosphere, exercises on coffee, by which its qualities are very materially deteriorated. I have found that a watery hot extract of roasted coffee, which, when fresh, is perfectly enjoyable, loses by degrees, if allowed to come in contact with the air, its agreeable flavor ; a black mass remains that cannot entirely be again dissolved in cold water, and which on account of its bad taste cannot be used.

Be the method of preparing coffee what it may, it is first requisite to sort the berries. Foreign substances are frequently found among them, bits of wood, feathers, and usually a number of black mouldy berries, which must be taken away ; for our sense of taste is so delicate that the smallest admixture cannot escape notice.

Berries of dark or green hue are generally dyed ; and these must first be washed in a little water, and afterwards dried with a warm linen cloth ; with those of a pale color this is unnecessary.

The next operation is the roasting. On this depends the good quality of the coffee. In reality the berries should only be roasted until they have lost their horny condition, so that they may be ground, or as is done in the east, pounded to a fine powder.

Coffee contains a crystalline substance, named caffeine or theine, because it is also a component part of tea.-

This matter is volatile, and every care must be taken to retain it in the coffee. For this purpose the berries should be roasted till they are of a pale brown color ; in those which are too dark there is no caffeine ; if they are black, the essential parts of the berries are entirely destroyed, and the beverage prepared from these does not deserve the name of coffee.

The berries of coffee, once roasted, lose every hour somewhat of their aroma, in consequence of the influence of the oxygen of the air, which owing to the porosity of the roasted berries, can easily penetrate.

This pernicious change may best be avoided by strewing over the berries, when the roasting is completed, and while the vessel in which it has been done is still hot, some powdered white or brown sugar (half an ounce to one pound of coffee is sufficient.) The sugar melts immediately, and by well shaking or turning the roaster quickly, it spreads over all the berries, and gives each one a fine glaze, impervious to the atmosphere ; they have then a shining appearance, as though covered with a varnish, and they in consequence lose their smell entirely, which, however, returns in a high degree as soon as they are ground.

After this operation, they are to be shaken out rapidly from the roaster and spread on a cold plate of iron, so that they may cool as soon as possible. If the hot berries are allowed to remain heaped together, they begin to sweat, and when the quantity is large the heating process, by the influence of air, increases to such a degree that at last they take fire spontaneously ; the roasted and glazed berries should be kept in a dry place, because the covering of sugar attracts moisture.

If the raw berries are boiled in water, from 23 to 24 per cent. of soluble matter is extracted. On being roasted till they assume a pale chestnut color, they lose 15 to 16 per cent., and the extract obtained from these by means of boiling water is 20 to 21 per cent. of the weight of the unroasted berries ; the loss in weight of the extract is much larger when the roasting process is carried on till the color of the berries is dark brown or black. At the same time that the berries lose in weight by roasting they gain in volume by swelling ; roasting adds a volume of 50 to 60 per cent.

The usual methods of preparing coffee are, first, by filtration ; second, by infusion ; third, by boiling.

Filtration gives often, but not always, a good cup of coffee. When the pouring the boiling water over the ground coffee is done slowly, the drops in passing come in contact with too much air, whose oxygen works a change in the aromatic particles, and often destroys them entirely. The extraction, moreover, is incomplete. Instead of 20 to 21 per cent, the water dissolves only 11 to 15 per cent, and 7 to 10 per cent is lost.

Infusion is accomplished by making the water boil, and then putting in the ground coffee ; the vessel being immediately taken off the fire and allowed to stand quietly for about ten minutes. The coffee is ready for use when the powder swimming on the surface falls to the bottom on slightly stirring it. This method gives a very aromatic coffee, but one containing little extract.

Boiling, as is the custom in the East, yields excellent coffee. The powder is put on the fire in cold water, which is allowed merely to boil up a few seconds. The fine particles of coffee are drunk with the beverage. If boiled long, the aromatic parts are volatilized, and the coffee is then rich in extract, but poor in aroma.

As the best method, I adopt the following, which is a union of the second and the third :

The usual quantities both of coffee and water are to be retained ; a tin measure containing half an ounce of green berries, when filled with roasted ones, is generally sufficient for two small cups of coffee of moderate strength, or one, so called. large breakfast-cup (one pound of green berries, equal to 16 ounces, yielding after roasting 24 tin measures [of ½ ounce] for 48 small cups of coffee.)

With three fourths of the coffee to be employed, after being ground, the water is made to boil for ten or fifteen minutes. The one quarter of the coffee which has been kept back is then flung in, and the vessel immediately withdrawn from the fire, covered over, and allowed to stand for five or six minutes. In order that the powder on the surface may fall to the bottom, it is stirred round ; the deposit takes place, and the coffee poured off is ready for use. In order to separate the dregs more completely, the coffee may be passed through a clean cloth ; but generally this is not necessary, and often prejudicial to the pure flavor of the beverage.

The first boiling gives the strength, the second addition the flavor. The water does not dissolve of the aromatic substances more than the fourth part contained in the roasted coffee.

The beverage when ready ought to be of a brown-black color ; nuntransparent it always is, somewhat like chocolate thinned with water ; and this want of clearness in coffee so prepared does not come from the fine grounds, but from a peculiar fat resembling butter, about twelve per cent of which the berries contain, and which, if over-roasted, is partly destroyed.

In the other methods of making coffee, more than the half of the valuable parts of the berries remains in the "grounds," and is lost.

To judge as favorably of my coffee as I do myself, its taste is not to be compared with that of the ordinary beverage, but rather the good effects might be taken into consideration which my coffee has on the organism. Many persons, too, who connect the idea of strength or concentration with a dark or black color, fancy my coffee to be thin and weak, but these were at once inclined more favorably directly I gave it a dark color by means of burnt sugar, or by adding some substitute.

The real flavor of coffee is so little known to most persons, that many who drank my coffee for the first time doubted of its goodness, because it tasted of the berries. A coffee, however, which has not the flavor of the berry is no coffee, but an artificial beverage, for which many other things may be substituted at pleasure. Hence it comes that if to the decoction made from roasted chicory, carrots, or beet-root, the slightest quantity of coffee be added, few persons detect the difference. This accounts for the great diffusion of each substitute. A dark mixture, with an empyreumatical taste, most people fancy to be coffee. For tea there are no substitutes, because everybody knows what real tea is like.

Heating qualities have generally been attributed to coffee, and for this reason it is avoided by many people : however, these heating qualities belong to the volatile products called forth by the destruction of the soluble parts of the berries in the process of roasting. Coffee prepared in my manner is not heating, and I have found that it may be taken after dinner without disturbing the digestion—a circumstance which, with me at least, always takes place after the enjoyment of strongly-roasted coffee.

For special cases, such as journeys and marches, where it is impossible to be burdened with the necessary machines for roasting and grinding, coffee may be carried in a powdered form, and its aromatic properties preserved by the following process : One pound of the roasted berries are reduced to powder and immediately wetted with a syrup of sugar, obtained by pouring on three ounces of sugar two ounces of water, and letting them stand a few minutes. When the powder is thoroughly wetted with the syrup, two ounces of finely-powdered sugar are to be added, mixed well with it, and the whole is then to be spread out in the air to dry. The sugar locks up the volatile parts of the coffee, so that when it is dry they cannot escape. If coffee is now to be made, cold water is to be poured over a certain quantity of the powder and made to boil. Ground coffee prepared in this way, and which lay exposed to the air for one month, yielded, on being boiled, as good a beverage as one made of freshly-roasted berries.

THE GROOVES OF LIFE.—Every human being has some handle by which he may be lifted, some groove in which he was meant to run ; and the great work of life, so far as our relations with each other are concerned, is to lift each one by his own proper handle, and run each one in his own proper groove.

THE LADY-WITCH.

THE curious story of the Lady Morris, once held in Doncaster and the country-side for miles around to be gospel truth, but for the last century pooh-pooh'd even there into oblivion, must have had a strong foundation of truth. Internal and external evidence seem to prove that. The lady, it may be admitted, was a magician, but hers was natural magic—the magic of singular beauty, combined with an astute, unscrupulous intellect; and her moral or immoral husbandry found an exhaustless field for its exercise in the ever-fruitful soil of human weakness and credulity. The success of the Lady-Witch, like that of Joseph Balsamo, is easily enough accounted for without the attribution of supernatural functions. It seems pretty clear that the only mesmeric influence, in which I have any faith—that which flashes from the dark, liquid, penetrative eyes of a beautiful woman, revealing by its dazzling light unfathomable depths—was with her a very potent instrument of power.

Helen Royston was born in a cottage situate in the environs of Doncaster, and distant a few miles only from that city. Her mother died when she was still an infant (1653,) and her father, once one of Cromwell's world-famous troopers—"Valiant-for-Truth Royston" was his military sobriquet—after the "crowning mercy" at Naseby, where he was severely wounded, settled down for the remainder of his days near his native city; married; had one daughter, Helen; followed his loving and beloved partner to the grave; and thenceforward the stern practical man-of-war came gradually to be a dreamer of dreams. The near approach of the period when Satan should be bound for a thousand years—which he had once as firmly believed in as that it was his duty to smite the ungodly, hip and thigh, and spare not—faded from the tablet of his creed. He ceased to believe in the Millennium. At all events he ceased to hope that it would dawn upon a sinful world in his own lifetime—that is, if that lifetime could not be indefinitely prolonged. The hazy speculations of the veteran took that direction, and like hundreds of other alchemaic visionaries, he diligently set himself to the study of the science taught by the adepts conversant with the doctrines taught by the brethren of the Rosy Cross. In other words, he devoted himself to the discovery of the Elixir of Life—the manufacture of gold from the basest metals, his dazzling reward, perennial life; inexhaustible riches!

We need not follow John Royston through the mazes of a dream from which he never awoke, dying as he did at the very moment when for the thousandth time he believed that the hour of supreme success was about to strike.

Royston inherited a modest income, partly terminable with his life, more than sufficient for his own and daughter's needs. He had also skill in pharmacy, was acquainted with the qualities of herbs and other simple medicaments. These in many cases, some pronounced incurable by orthodox practitioners, were administered with great success. His daughter, as she grew up in strength, remarkable intelligence, and rare beauty, took this good Samaritan work into her own hands. She acquired a strange influence over her patients. The most fractious, obstinate, and wayward, were subdued in her presence as by an irresistible spell. Some muttered to themselves or each other that she had "an evil eye" and that though she cured persons for the time, it was only to make them her bond-slaves, and that when the time came, they would be made to feel the yoke of slavery to which, by having recourse to her, they had subjected themselves.

No fable was too gross for general acceptance in those days, and, sooth to say, the present day, in many and many a rural district of enlightened England. The old Cromwellian and his beautiful daughter, burrowing in such strange seclusion, were believed by hundreds of men and women, who, in the ordinary affairs of the world had their heads screwed on right, to be wizard and witch; and that, though apparently kind and charitable, their alms-deeds and medicaments were but devil's gifts, which would have to be repaid with hellish usury one day, no one knows how soon. One thing was certain—neither the father nor daughter ever went to church. This would, of course, be the case, orthodox Church-of-England services being alone tolerated. It was not likely that "Valiant-for-Truth" Royston would join a prelatic Church, of which Charles I. was the first martyr, or encourage his daughter to do so.

The old man died dreaming, as I have said, of the immediate realization of his Rosicrucian visions. Helen shut herself up in strict privacy for a while, during which time her keen, ambitious intellect was casting about to discover the true means by which gold could be extracted from inferior substances.

By and bye it was known that the lady-witch might be again consulted, and it was given out that she not only cured paralytic and otherwise diseased men and women by charms and spells, but that she could tell the future as well as the past of every one's life; and that any one who should incur her enmity was doomed to destruction. Helen Royston had a singularly melodious voice, and would sometimes of a moonlight night betake herself to a sort of arbor not many yards distant from a tiny lake near the cottage, where her father had kept several swans; and, herself concealed, warble forth snatches of delicious songs. The singer being invisible, it came to be at last an article of popular faith that on certain moonlight nights Helen Royston assumed the shape of a swan, for some purpose certainly not heavenly, and known only to herself and the Evil One!

Suddenly an epidemic spread amongst the horses about the neighborhood; scores died; veterinary skill was powerless to arrest the destruction going on, and horse-doctors whispered solemn hints that the lady-witch was at the bottom of the sad business. Had not old Gaffer Hunsbridge, in whose stables the disease had first broken forth, quarrelled with and, being drunk, cursed her—otherwise he would no more have durst do so than have taken a lion by the beard—for allowing or setting on, as he said, the huge savage mastiff, without which animal she never left the cottage, to worry a favorite pup of his? There could be no doubt about it; and was she, because she was a lady-witch;—that is, dressed finely, and was beautiful—a device of the devil that, too—to escape the well-merited fate which coarse and ugly witches had righteously undergone?

Certainly not. Still the most furious held back when it was proposed to convert intent into action. At last, the epidemic not ceasing, a professional witch-finder was summoned to the rescue; a kind of minor Hopkins, of the name of Stubbs. He had no scruples; and backed by a mob, the young lady-witch was seized, and spite of the furious resistance of the mastiff, who lost his life in the vain attempt to defend his mistress, would have been subjected to the ordeal by water in the tiny lake where she had so often appeared in the semblance of a swan, but for the sudden appearance upon the spot of Arthur Morris and a number of college youths, who, like him, were at home for the vacation. Arthur Morris was the youngest son of the lord of the manor, and had been more than once seen sidling along with the lady-witch in her wood-walks. The interference of Arthur Morris and his friends was decisive. Stubbs, "whose heart was well in his work," angrily remonstrated, assuring Arthur Morris and his friends that whoever interfered by force in favor of a witch would certainly pine away and die before the year had passed.

The lady-witch was rescued and restored to her home, and the witch-finder's prophecy was realized so far as regarded Arthur Morris. He was the shadow of Helen Royston whenever she appeared abroad, and made some excuse for not returning to Cambridge, when he should have done so. He was not, however, it seemed, a favorite with the fair witch who held him in thrall; so Arthur Morris gradually pined away and died. At the last hour, or nearly so, of his life, the dying son prevailed upon his father, Sir Richard Morris, to send for the lady-witch, for whom the baronet felt almost as superstitious a repugnance as did the stupidest of the boors upon his estate.

There was no end to the stories related of the mischievous marvels performed by the beguiling lady—her supernatural reputation being no doubt much heightened by the eccentric vagaries in which she delighted to indulge. I have no space to reproduce the many curious anecdotes circulated respecting her.

At last another victim was about to be offered up to the siren's infernal arts. Richard, eldest son of Sir Richard Morris, the brother of Arthur had fallen under the spell. He, like that unfortunate, might be seen wandering about the woods and meadows with the beautiful witch. Sir Richard was warned. He hastened at once from London, instantly took his infatuated son into strict custody—at his own manor-house, of course—and consulted his brother magistrates as to how a person who habitually conducted herself in such an altogether out-of-the-way fashion, had, it could be proved, ruined the health, destroyed the peace of mind of several very estimable young men, and caused a pestilence amongst the cattle for miles around, should be dealt with.

There were, it would seem, long and grave consultations, without producing any decided result. The stories told of the fair witch—her incantations, her flight across the lake, when, in the shape of a swan, she received a full charge of shot from the gun of a sportsman, screaming as she flew, and that in consequence of the wound she could not appear out for many days—broke down, even in the hazy estimation of the Doncaster Solomons. At last Sir Richard, it was reported, had determined to take the matter into his own hands, and no doubt justice would be done. The lady had been summoned to the manor-house—that was positive, for several persons had seen her enter therein. Judgment would no doubt be speedily pronounced by Sir Richard. The expectation was verified, and speedily. "It is all settled," said one of Sir Richard's deerkeepers, entering a hostelry one evening. "The lady-witch won't trouble any of us much longer——"

"Hurrah!"

"Won't trouble any of us much longer: 'cause why? She be gwine to be married right out of hand to Sir Richard's eldest son! Talk of witches, I say. Whe-e-w."—Russell's Eccentric Personages.

THE "NATIVE CALIFORNIANS."

THE people that made up the body of the population were dashing and careless, fond of fandangoes, always ready for a dance, making the most of their religious holidays with bull-fights and bear-baitings, and almost universally given to gambling. Monte was their favorite game, in which all classes, and men and women alike, engaged. They accepted their good fortune without any lively demonstrations of joy, and their losses did not disturb their composure of mind. On Sunday afternoons, devotions being ended, they generally surrendered themselves to some sort of gay festivity.

There were few such riders in the world. Wild horses, though every one had his claimant, scoured the plains in droves, and those that were accounted tame would seem to any other people quite unbroken. When a gentleman set out on a journey, he took a driver and a drove of horses with him. As one animal wearied of the saddle, another was made to bear the burden. In this way a hasty rider would accomplish his hundred miles a day. If a horse gave out on the road, he was turned loose to find his way home at his leisure. His owner's name was branded on his flank; there was little danger of his being lost; but of his being stolen there was great danger, since with the Indian, relapsed into barbarism, horse stealing was a passion.

The child, at a very early age, was taught to ride at a breakneck pace, and with the use of the lariat every one was dexterous. The saddle was an elaborate piece of workmanship; the stirrups were of wood, and set well back; the skirts were broad, and pierced for strips of raw-hide with which to lash fast the blankets and baggage of the rider. It was fastened very tightly by a wide girth, without the aid of a buckle, and in a manner that made slipping or turning impossible. Over its high pommel was coiled the inevitable lasso. The bridle, like the lasso, was of braided rawhide. To the bit was attached a cruelly long spur, running back upon the beast's tongue, so that the slightest pull at the bridle compelled obedience without much reference to the original intentions of the brute. He soon learned to take his cue from the weight of the rein upon his neck, and the horseman dashed along the highway, generally at full gallop, with loose reins. A poor man might own a dozen horses, but he was rich who was supplied with the complete furniture for one. When overtaken by night on the road, the saddle was his pillow; the blankets, unrolled from the bundles that they were as they dangled from it, were bedding and covering enough in so mild a climate; and the ever-useful lasso limited the range of the horse, as he fed on the wild oats of the valley.

It was not until the Indians discovered how delicate and savory roast horse-flesh was, that the tribe of horse-thieves sprang into existence, but then they grew with astonishing rapidity, till they were the terror of all the country. Their chief haunts were the valleys of the San Joaquin and its tributaries. Temperate writers estimate that from five thousand to ten thousand horses were stolen and eaten in the twenty years between 1827 and 1847. It is impossible to conceive how frightful the nuisance was, unless we bear in mind how large a proportion of the mule population jingled immense spurs at their heels perpetually, and that, unhorsed, the Californian considered himself but half a man.

Their houses were one-story high, generally built of large unburned bricks, or adobes, floored with clay, and roofed with tiles. The pleasures of the table were not foremost in their thoughts; the supply of flour for the day was ground in hand-mills each morning from the grain. Tortillas—simply thin cakes of meal beaten by hand and baked before the fire—figured at every meal. Beans were a staple article of diet. Red peppers entered into the composition of every cooked dish, and, like onions, were cultivated in every garden. The table-drink was generally water; the use of milk would have implied tame cattle and work, so its presence was rare. The poorest householder had plenty of beef in his pot; the butchered animal was hung up under the shade of the oak, close by the house. In the clear, dry air, there was no risk of its tainting before the knife had cut off, day by day, the tenderer parts for the family, and the tougher for the troops of dogs that stretched themselves lazily in the sun.

The cattle introduced by Governor Portala and Father Junipero had increased beyond all calculation. They formed the principal wealth of the missions at one time, and for leagues the higher grounds were spotted with bullocks, while the valleys, for acre upon acre, waved with growing grain. There was food enough for all.

Every year all the cattle belonging to one party were gathered to a rodeo; that is, driven together and passed through a corral or pen, where they were branded with the owner's mark, or at least old brands inspected, and other necessary operations were performed upon the calves. It was always a merry occasion, beautifully adapted for the display of horsemanship in capturing and controlling the wild cattle; and, both because of its own charms, and to prevent the branding of other folks' cattle, the neighbors generally came in to share its sports. Every cattle-owner of course had his special brand, and his marking-iron was deposited with the alcalde of the district.

The mission gardens were hedged in with willows—at the south, with rows of the gigantic cactus. Fruit-trees were planted about the missions very generally. Shade-trees in the vicinity of houses were never in favor, but long alamedas, or shaded walks for the convenience of distant worshippers along the line of travel from the pueblos to the churches, were pretty features of the landscape.

Both sexes were excessively fond of dress, but they found little opportunity to humor their fancy in that matter. They had few of the luxuries of life, however great their wealth might be. With the extortionate impost duties, few elegancies were imported, but for the finery that did arrive they paid enormous prices.—Dr. Franklin Tuthill's History of California.

MR. NASBY PLEADS THE CAUSE OF A FRIEND.

CONFEDDRATE ✠ ROADS,
(wich is in the Stait of Kentucky,)
March 19, 1866.

YESTERDAY I happened to pick up a copy uv a fritefully depraved Ablishin paper, and my horror stricken eyes wuz glued to the follerin passage, which I read :

"I am happy to state to you that our free negroes are doing finely. We have no trouble with them. They have all gone to work manfully. They give an impetus to trade that we never before had. I have sold John Guttle's negroes this year and last more goods than I ever sold Guttle, and he owned two hundred and fifty slaves; so you sec the free negro system is working well with us."

Ez I peroozed them lines tears started involuntarily from my beamin eyes, and coursed in torreuts down my venerable cheeks. I know John Guttle well, I may say intimately. He wuz a dear friend, one uv the few which I call friend in the most catholic and comprehensive sense uv the word. He holds my note for eighteen dollars and 63 cents, and I hev somewhere among my papers, which I hev alluz carefully pre served for reference, a memorandum uv his address, that I might be shoor not to forget to send it to him. I give him the note becoz he furuisht the paper, and it made him easy in his mind. I put down the memorandum becoz it looked business-like. Benevolence is a prominent trait in my character—when givin my note for borrowed money will do a man good, I never begrudge the trouble uv writin it.

But what I wuz going to say wuz, that the feendishnis uv that item passes belief. The writer put it in print tu show that the abolishn uv slavery benefitted somebody. I grant him that the merchant, who undoubtedly wuz born in Massachusetts, wuz benefitted by the change, so are the greasy mechanics who are now pollutin the soil uv Alabama, and so probably are the 250 niggers, but in the name uv liberty, in the name uv justice, in the name uv the Constooshun uv the Yoonited States, and the flag uv our common country, I ask how about John Guttle?

John Guttle is robbed—John Guttle is deprived uv his property; the bread is taken from John Guttle's mouth, his staff is broken, his dependence is gone, he is bereft.

Never shall I forget John Guttle or his hospitable mansion ez I knowed it in the happy years afore the crooel war He wuz a gentleman uv the old skool—wun uv the few left us in these degenerate days. His home wuz wun uv unalloyed happiness. Situated just back uv Mobeel, he hed the finest plantashun in that section, and hed on it two hundred and fifty niggers. All shades wuz represented. There wuz the coal black Cuffee, whose feechers denoted the pure Afrikin, and whose awkward manners showed that he wuz uot long from Afrika. There wuz the civilized mulatto, in whose veins the Guttle blood showd; the quadroon, in whom the good old Guttle blood predominated; aud the octoroon, which wuz mostly Guttle. The Guttleses wuz eminently a Christian generation—they wuz devoutly pious, and there never wuz wun of the name who cood not repeat without the book all uv the texts bearin on slavery. The passages in which Onesimus and Hagar figger wuz favorites with em, but on "cussid be Canaan" they wuz strong. For geuerations they had mourned over the hard fate uv the sons uv Ham, doomed to perpetooal bondage, becoz uv the sin uv their father, and with a missionary spirit ekaled by few and exeelled by none, they did their part toward redoosin that cuss by makin ez menny uv em ez possible half-brothers to the more favored race uv Japheth, and thus bringin uv em out uv the cuss, and they hed mellered the color uv their charges down from the hideous black to a brite yeller. Under the old patriarkle system time passed orf smoothly and pleasantly with the Guttle family. Them 250 niggers wuz obliged uv course to work, and their labor wnz money. John bought each of the male sons of Ham two soots uv close per annum, and each of the female sons of Ham one soot. It wuz considered healthy for the young ones to go naked, wich they wuz religiously allowed to do, ez none of the Guttles uv that family wood do anything agin nater or her laws. The girls hed pianos, and wuz educated at the North; the boys wuz celebrated for horse racin and their skill for losin money at faro. They wuz hospitable and generous to a fault. Their honso wnz open house, and their beverages wuz aluz the best.

Money was no objick to them, for when they had a severe attack of poker, or faro, or hoss racin, they had plenty uv octoroons or quadroons, with the real Guttle nose, which brand was well known in Noo Orleans, and wood alluz command the highest possible figger that wuz paid in that market; or, ef they had no more than they wanted at home uv that style, why a few field hands wood be sold, and the remainin ones would be persuaded by the overseer to do the work uv the whole. John Guttle's sons wuz all in the Confederit army; his daughters, willin to sacrifice everything for the cause, heroically pledged theirselves to whip the niggers theirselves doorin their absence.

Now all is changed. A shadder hez fallen across that peaceful home. The nigger quarters is there, but the nigger is not. The broad plantashun is divided up into small farms, and half of it is owned by Ablishunists from the North, who work themselves, and who hev a meetin house on one corner uv it, and the niggers a skool house on tother. The race track is plowed up and in cotton—the whippin post and the stocks is taken down and burned—all, all the evidence uv civilizashun hez faded afore the ruthless hand of the invader. John Guttle, that generous old man, subsists by the labor uv his own hands—one uv his sons ekes out a miserable existence runniu a dray in Mobeel; another, who is gifted with no ordinary intelleck, earns a respectable livin playin seven-up in a small way with his former niggers, and the two girls is runnin a sowin masheen.

Talk not to me uv benefits. What is a dozen tradesmen and two hundred and fifty niggers to glorious old Dimocratic John Guttle? What is the interests uv a dozen or so Noo England mechanics, and the niggers aforesaid, when compared with that glorious aristocracy which kin never exist beside em? Kin I go and borrer eighteen dollars and sixty-three cents uv one of em? No. Becoz workin for their paltry livins they place a higher valyoo on money, and will not spread it around ez profoosely ez the noble race which preceded em.

Another great wrong is done in this settin free of John Guttle's niggers. John Guttle hez uv course, no further interest in the Dimocratic party. Slavery was the umbillikle chord which united the Southern slaveholder and the Northern Dimocrat, and that chord cut, why hez John Guttle any more in Dimocracy? We stood as a Chinese wall between them and the rushin flood of Abolishun fanaticism, and we made the wall biznis pay. They furnished money and we did the work, and there bein but few of us the orfices wuz easily divided. Alas, our okkepashin's gone. The South is forever lost to us, for she has no dirty work for us to do.

I appeal to the Yoonited States uv Americn.

In behalf of John Guttle I say give him baek his niggers.

In behalf uv the Dimocrisy North, who are out uv employment, give him back his niggers.

In behalf uv his son, who is runnin a dray, givo him back his niggers.

In behalf uv his daughters, runnin a sowin-machine, give him back his niggers.

Make things Normal again. Like John the Baptist, the Government shall hear the voice uv one howlin in the wilderness untill all these is done. PETROLEUM V. NASBY, Lait Pastor uv the Church of the Noo Dispensashun.

ADULTERATION OF LIQUORS.

PERHAPS it might be better for all mankind if that heterogeneous legion were to rally round the flag of Father Matthew, and forswear the use of all drinks based upon alcohol. But, as the age of absolute virtue has not yet arrived, (see the police reports,) it may be as well for those who will indulge in stimulating beverages to investigate their liquor, aud consider calmly the ingredients which they are likely to imbibe with it.

To such an extent has the "doctoring" of liquors been carried of late years, that it would not be too much to say that all the spirits dispersed over the bars of the public houses are of a deleterious quality, more or less. And the same may be said of the wines. In the city of New York, there are numerous establishments in which the manufacture of spurious brandy is openly carried on, and that to an incredible extent. In a case which lately came before one of the United States District Courts, some curious revelations were made with regard to this. One dealer admitted that he sold immense quantities of a stuff passed off for French brandy. Several casks containing this stuff were seized, and, on examination, it was found that they were of home manufacture, put together after the fashion of French casks, and marked with the foreign brands. It was proved that the contents of these poison-kegs did not comprehend a single drop of brandy. The basis of the stuff was something like what distillers call "high wines;" the brandy flavor was imparted to it with a deleterious drug called oil of Cognac, and the addition of a sufficient quantity of burnt sugar toned it to the required tint. The peculiar, smoky flavor of Scotch whiskey may be given to any kind of neutral spirit with oil of tar—which might not be a very popular element of the frequent beverage, if people only knew something about its properties. There are manufacturers of "elegant extracts" whose business it is to supply the trade with the means for imitating all the popular liquors, and there can be no better evidence of the extent to which adulteration has gone, than the fact that these manufacturers have all made a good thing of it.

There can be little doubt that the increase of atrocious crime keeps pace with the adulteration of liquor. The delirium produced by "doctored" spirits is known to be of a more savage and dangerous kind than the excitement which follows the use of less fiery stimulants. Illustration of this may be taken from the northern nations of Europe, among whom there is a large consumption of alcoholic drinks unaccompanied, however, by the exhibition of murderous passion: and if nobody ever hears of a Scottish Highlander getting drunk on his famous "mountain dew," and sticking a knife into his compotator while under the influence of it, it might be worth while to inquire whether the quality of the liquor drunk by him has not something to do with the fact.—New York Review.

ELOQUENT INVECTIVE.

THE following example is given of a peculiar kind of invective by epigram, which springs directly from personal character. Sydney Smith once justified an assault on a man of moderate abilities, whose purposes he cousidered as mischievous as they were well meant. "I do not attack him," said he, "for love of glory, but from a love of utility as a burgomaster hunts a rat in a Dutch dike for fear it will flood a province."

Burke was a great master of lofty contemptuousness. A fine specimen of that is the well-known passage in which he likened the English sympathizers with the French revolution to grasshoppers, filling the air with their importunate chirp, "whilst thousands of great cattle, reposing under the British oak, chew the cud and are silent." Scarcely less celebrated is his attack on the Duke of Bedford, where his object is to degrade the whole house of Russell by emphasizing the corruption, servility, and extortion of its founder. Knowing how well aware was all England of the patriots who had been connected with that house, he makes that fact a deviation from the natural character of their family. "It is little to be doubted," he says, "that several of his forefathers, in that long series, have degenerated into honor and virtue."

The practical business of invective is best done by irony, uttered with coolness and deliberation. The emotional element must not be permitted to predominate. That method which implies the greatest self-possession imparts the keenest edge to the blow, and irony does not admit of a successful reply. No one understood better than Grattan the effect of the contemptuous method. The best illustration of his use of it is his reply to an obscure but aspiring opponent in the Irish House of Commons, who assailed him in a stupidly scurrilous speech with the hope of drawing upon himself the invective which had so often smitten Flood and Fitzgibbon. But Grattan could not condescend to give his oppouent the celebrity he craved. Rising in his seat, he simply said:

"I shall make no other remark on the personalities of the honorable member who has just spoken than merely to say, that, as he rose without a friend, so he has certainly sat down without having made an enemy."

Commenting upon a mode of invective somewhat too common in what are called deliberative bodies, the direct personal assault, it has been remarked by Emerson, that it makes a great difference in the force of a sentence whether a man be behind it or no. It was his personal manhood which gave peculiar energy to the invective of Chatham, who was described in his youth as "that terrible cornet of horse, whose scowl gave Sir Robert Walpole a pain in the back." It is sad to think that even Mansfield, so supreme in understaudiug, should have been cowed by a more ferocious physical organization. It is said that the younger Pitt inherited the fierceuess and brute force of his father, aud that even the accomplished Erskine quailed before him in the House of Commons. "The fact is, Erskine," said Sheridan once to him, "you are afraid of Pitt, and that is the weak point of your character."

COMSTOCK, whose name has been immortalized by being connected with the richest silver mine in the United States, is prospecting for gold in Montana. Alva Gould, the locator of the famous Gould & Curry, is living on the labor of his own hands, being eugaged in making shingles in Washoe Valley.

The above item has turned up about once a month for the last year and a-half. We sincerely trust that Comstock may find something more substantial than prospects, and that Gould may be blessed with more toothsome fare than shingles before it comes our turn to copy the statement again.

MR. SANFORD, a gentleman to whom San Francisco is largely indebted—and apparently always will be—for the ornamentation of the Custom House square is out in a card, from which we learn that he is out of pocket somewhat over two thousand dollars in consequent of his æsthetic labors. Should Mr. S. die in this city, no doubt a grateful people would expend as much money in erecting a monument, to keep his memory ever green, as is now needed to pay him for his ever-greeus. We believe in ante-mortem displays of gratitude.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

CHARLES HENRY WEBB, EDITOR.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 5. 1866.

A PLEA FOR HOLIDAYS.

THERE is no population of any city, in our present remembrance, to which recreation, to a reasonable extent, is so necessary as to that of San Francisco. When we say recreation we refer to some mode of compensation to the mind and body after our daily harassments. Our California life is one of incessant activity, when the brain is kept to a constant tension by the ordinary demands of every description of trade and profession, and when, if we would keep pace with competition, we must devote all of our energies to business. We have an opinion that, under a healthy system of commerce, industry and a correct code of working-morals—morals as applied to daily business transactions—there would be less reason to complain of our American unrest and almighty dollarism. Mr. Smith would gladly leave his counting-room at three P. M., and spend the rest of the day in respectable and cheerful idleness, except that Mr. Brown refuses to close his store until five P. M., and thus he gets the advantage of him by two hours, and, perhaps, a half dozen customers. It is this rivalry, this sordid emulation and envy which keeps our American physique in a state of frenzy until we are forty, and after that we are physically and mentally prostrated for the balance of our lives. It is a matter of public knowledge and a commonly expressed physiological fact that, in proportion to our population, there is more insanity in this State, and, we may add, more untimely mortality among men than in any other portion of the United States. These evils have not their origin in, indeed they are not influenced by, climate. The physical character of this State is favorable to the highest longevity. No part of the world unites so many of the conditions to a high development of race, soil and atmosphere as California. Our tendency, then, to insanity, cerebral diseases and early death is due altogether to social excitements, to trade, to constant and unremitting mental activity, to absorption in business, to lack of recreation, amusement and holidays. This tendency is peculiarly American. We have the sole distinction, in all statistics affecting human life and its diseases, of being the shortest-lived and unhealthiest of all civilized mankind. If the working classes have one claim to the benefits of the eight-hour system, then the brain classes—those who employ the mental faculties—have a score. While the labor of the one merely affects the muscle, that of the other directly and retro-actively influences the whole man—brain, nerves, muscles and all.

Looking, then, to our physical and mental improvement as a nation, and welcoming any and all means which can take from us the odium of being a skinny, consumptive race, do we gladly notice plans for parks; parks established at San Mateo and Alameda, excursions to Oakland, target-shooting by our military, and picnics for Sunday-school children. And on Sundays we observe, with pleasure and hope, the crowded cars for points between this and San José; and the ferry boats, looking like bee-hives, as it were, as they start for Contra Costa. It is also a source of pleasure that, on Saturday afternoons, many of our stores close at three P. M., thus giving their clerks a third-holiday; and we have recently seen an advertisement from the lawyers, stating that hereafter they will close their respective places of business at 12 M. on Saturdays. These are all signs of promise—promise of health and vigor to our sadly abused brains and bodies.

The New Daily.—"The Times Publishing Company" has filed articles of incorporation for the purpose of publishing a daily paper in this city. The capital stock is figured at $150,000, to be divided into fifteen hundred shares. The Trustees announced are all well known business men, though totally inexperienced in the business of newspaper publishing. Rumor is already busy in filling the editorial department. We trust that the Times may be able to achieve success, and that no stockholder may ever have reason to exclaim with "Hamlet,"

> "The Time(s) is out of joint—O, cursed spite,
> That ever I was born to set it right!"

New Street Railway.—The cars of the Sutter and Polk street railroad commenced running on the first of May. The route extends through Sutter street to Polk, and through Polk to Broadway, its western terminus.

SHREDS AND PATCHES.

SIX weeks ago we jumped on board the Napa steamer, just as she was leaving the wharf, and went to Suscol. The previous week it had rained, and we were anxious lest the morning in question would be of a piece with the preceding ones. But the clerk of the weather proved himself to be amiable—for he turned the wind from the clear quarter, opened all the blue sky to us, drove the storm-clouds away, and left in their stead fleecy cloud-phantasms—delicate and airy as if painted on the blue sky by the Artist Frost.

The air was cool, yet there was pleasure in sitting out on deck and gazing on the mountains, gorged and ravined as far as we could see, and covered with verdure of exquisite freshness and delicacy. There was no uniformity of color—far from it. In some places the green was as warm as if made up of osier branches, while in others it was dark as ivy leaves, and scattered between were brown spots where the plough had been. Add to these, splendid contrasts of light and shade, and we have tried to outline as beautiful a view as we have seen for many a day.

At 11:30 we reached Mare Island, where we landed a score of Jack Tars who had been on "liberty." We hadn't time to go on shore. We lounged idle eyes on the groups at the landing, on the extraordinary domicils, standing a little inland, which seem all the world like lazy schoolboys put in a row for punishment, and then, swinging around, we encountered the low hull of the Camanche, which looked like a mouster of the Liassic sea.

We were soon in Napa creek, winding through the sedgy marsh lands, flecked with white wings of water fowl and green clumps of tussack grass; and beyond were the velvety slopes of the Coast Range, broken by groves of trees and the houses of the settlers. A friend met us at the embarcadero, and soon we were driving inland, through an avenue of locust trees, while on either side were rows of peach in early blossom, and the pear, which, with its white flowering, looked beautiful and bride-like. This spot was once the great fruit producer of this State. We remember that, in 1853, when peaches were worth quite a dollar a piece, we stopped here on our way from Napa, where we saw at least fifty baskets of them; and how we longed for a taste of just one! Since then we have crushed our teeth on quite as many.

The first day we spent in looking at the improvements and in listening to the details of proposed changes, in eating fresh eggs and drinking creamed milk. The next day the sky was clear again, and when the sun got well up the air was mild and soft. M. and ourself took our fishing rods and sauntered up the stream which brawls over its pebbled bed through the whole length of his domain, on its way to Napa Creek. We found a quiet little nook, where the brook deepened, in a cluster of trees—of bay trees and willow, and a sort of elder which grew on the edge, its green branches trailing to the very water. We paused here, but with no piscatory intent. The place was so secluded and quiet, the flow of the rivulet so even and murmuring, the grass so green, and the sun so vivid, that really we thought of nothing but lying quiet, and dreaming the afternoon away. But, before we should be lost in idleness, we tossed our line into the stream, little caring whether we had a bite or not. Ten trout were bent on immolating themselves, and so in a little while they lay panting on the grass, and soon they hadn't life enough for somersets. We had no feeling of triumph and pleasure, such as anglers describe. If it would have restored them to life, we would have tossed them back into the brook, and left them to the chances of another idler. We walked back to the house, and, leaving our rod, we started again and followed the creek up to the mountain slopes, some ten miles above. Its course was distinctly traced by the line of trees which stretched away towards the hills, with a directness so unusual, that it seemed as if the hand of man had placed them there. And yet we found spots wild enough, where fallen trunks of trees lay across and along the brook; where huge rocks were heaped up, from which the waters fell in sheets and drops of shining silver; and where the foliage was so thick that only little lines of sunlight could get through. One such spot we have marked as a hiding-place from the garish sun some summer-day—a regular bower, where the branches of the trees on either side interlace, letting the sunlight through in vapory gleams, and where the waters, rushing for some yards over the rocky ledge, leap from the bluff rim of a boulder into a dark little pool below—not angrily and noisily, but languishingly and sportively, as if Naiads had their home there.

We went on until we came to a small farm-house, situated on the hill slope, on the edge of the ravine through which this same stream leaped. The owner came out, a slight sun-browned fellow, the place of whose nativity we couldn't conjecture. He looked like an Italian, but he hadn't the accent of one, and when we sought to identify him with that race that once "jugged" us, we found a lack of verisimilitude which started us off on other conjectures. As we walked away from him we were preceded by a woman who was, we swear, of the land of Iturbide—for she had the complexion, hair and eyes of one, and no woman ever wore rebozo as she did, without she had been born, or passed years in the clime of the Maguey. We feel so kind and grateful to the women of that race—for when in peril and danger they warned and guarded us; when hungry they have fed us; and when their male countrymen have persecuted us, they had kind words of hope and encouragement. So it was we followed this woman with a heart full of unexpressed blessings.

We got back a little before sunset, and until dinner we lounged and idled with the dogs, or watched setting hens—wondering how they amused themselves during incubation. One of them—a yellow speckled thing—seemed the most earnest creature we ever saw. She went to her work as if she fully appreciated its responsibility, and as if she had a wager she would hatch every egg she sat upon, and we'll bet she did it.

When the sun peeped through the windows of our rooms the next morning, we felt a regret in thinking that, when he went down, we would be back at San Francisco. After breakfast we sat upon the porch, much too dull for any emotion, and yet, at moments, we had a clear consciousness of the unusual beauty of the landscape, we looked upon—made up as it were of hill and river—valley and meadow land. Away to the south, beyond the brown tule lands, through which the creek meandered, looking like a cord of silver, rose up the mountains of Marin county and the bluff sides of Angel Island; and, standing out from the purple haze of the far perspective, were the white sails of water-craft. Near us were parallels of peach and pear trees in full blossom, and here and there stood isolated oaks, hung with flowing tufts of moss, their gnarled arms bare yet, and leafless.

The afternoon was blustering, and so when we reached the city it was quite dark. As we went homeward through the misty streets we could not but go back to the crimson blossoms of the peach we had just left; the long line of locusts and their young leaflets; the clear singing brook and its glassy slopes, and that quiet which gave to the whole scene a religious aspect and sentiment. During these two days we had seen pictures more gorgeous than Church or Bierstadt had ever painted, mere sketches of which we thus limn from memory.

INIGOINGS.

Pacific Mail Steamer "Sacramento,"
Near Acapulco, April 24, 1866.

OF right this letter should, perhaps, be headed "Outgoings," for we are so far outside the Golden Gate that we cannot hear its hinges creaking behind us. But manage the head of the article as you please: it is all I can do to fill out the body.

A clergyman once read a note handed to him in the pulpit, hastily written and imperfectly punctuated, as follows: "A gentleman having gone to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation."

Is it possible that I, who have been "Going, going," like an auctioneer's hammer, so long, am "gone" to sea at last?

That I am enhammered of a sea voyage under any circumstances, I cannot conscientiously say, even when it is performed on a steamer like the Sacramento, provided with every comfort—

> "Where every prospect pleases [so to speak],
> And only man is vile."

Travelling is always a bore, and I am ennuied to death. It is certainly a blessing to get away from newspapers, but then one can't go down town in the morning. In fact, there is no place to go to.

The first two or three days passed off charmingly—they must have done so, for I remember very little about them.

It is surprising how parting drinks with one's friends affect the physical system. The steamer was far outside your heads before I recovered mine.

The reader will pardon me when he knows that I generally shun the bowl. And that, on this occasion, I only drank to..drown my grief at leaving San Francisco.

Oh, my feelings, as Telegraph Hill faded away in the distance, beckoning me to come back! But the paddle-wheels rolled remorselessly on, and I was forced away. Such is life.

Time will perhaps bring balm to my sorrow, but just now I'm irrepressible—I mean that my sorrow is inexpressible and I am inconsolable.

The baggage mast-er—so called because he sticks our baggage away at the mast-head, or somewhere else, where no one can get at it—remarked to me, when I was down among various packages, looking for balm, that he thought I had already had balm enough—that I was "full," in fact.

To which I replied that though I might be full, he was certainly Fuller. (The gentleman's name is Fuller, you see, and that is where the joke comes in.)

The steamer Sacramento, which at present answers as my writing-desk, is a fine steamer, of a good many tons burthen. She is provided with quite a number of saloons, state-rooms, life-preservers, and wheel-houses. The greatest drawback to comfort I have yet experienced within her wooden walls is the constant habit they have of sweeping the decks and set - ting the tables. Nine hundred and ninety-nine freedmen—they have a Freedmen's Bureau in the captain's stateroom—are employed to do nothing else but sweep and set tables, working twenty-four hours a day.

Never do I get comfortably planted to read or write that I am not compelled to move, and with a change of base always comes a change of ideas—which will account for any slight disconnectedness which may be apparent in this letter.

Another slight drawback to comfort is an insufficiency of chairs. They only have one to each passenger, and it is a well known fact that most men generally employ three—one to sit in, one to rest their elbows upon, and another one to support their feet.

But what is lacked in chairs is fully made up in children. This is the fourteenth trip of the Sacramento. Never before has she been allowed to carry any but adults. Notice was given, though, that on the fourteenth trip, children would be allowed. Knowing what a comfortable vessel she was, parents with large families have been holding back for her. The consequence is that the conglomerated children of all previous trips are crowded into the present one. You can hardly sit down without spoiling a child, and, as for promenading, it is next to an impossibility. The water tank in the main saloon is so constantly surrounded, that I've not yet dared to take a drink there, for fear of swallowing a baby. Never till now did I appreciate King Herod at his true value. A few few minutes ago, for instance, I had just got comfortably settled to my work at a table—an interval of five minutes intervenes between clearing away the lunch and setting the tables for dinner—when a fond mother came in with a baby at her breast and took a seat directly opposite. The little wretch opened its batteries at once, with a yell as though

> All the fiends from Heaven that fell,
> Had pealed the banner cry of Hell, driving me from the position at once. And directly opposite my stateroom is a family with two little responsibilities, that open out regularly at four in the morning.

"From the mouths of babes and sucklings" and all that may be well enough in theory, but it is their noise that preys upon my unaccustomed ears.

As for the women, what shall I say? There is no scarcity of the matcrial certainly, but to say that there was a superabundauce of beauty would be to utter a lamentable untruth. Were it not for a few who leaven the lump of uncomeliness, I would say that the concentrated essence of female ugliness was to be found aboard this steamer. But some of the women are so pretty, that they cast a positive halo of glory over the whole horizon of ill-favored femininity.

Shall I name these exceptions? Ah, no! The list would not be so long as to give me much trouble, but sometimes a vague uncertainty is much more satisfactory than positive assurance. As the matter stands, every one of our lady passengers that happens to see this article will think that she is one of the few of whom complimentary mention is made, and happiness will be her lot for at least a week.

But, I am proud to say that my sex fully atones for any lack of comeliness that there is among the opposite one. Most of us are pretty, and those that are not have pretty ways—this latter is where I come in.

Nor am I the only distinguished passenger. My old friend, G. K. Fitch, of the Bulletin, is also on board. The report that he is accompanying me East through motives of disinterested affection has no foundation in truth, and the rumor that he contemplates a visit to Bierstadt at his chateau, and the purchase of a few of his last and best pictures, is equally incorrect. He is really going East to import foreign talent to assist in the local and editorial departments of his paper, having made up his mind that the judgment of his resident partner in selections is not to be relied upon. As to the current statement that he is bound to Europe on important business, with which another eminent Californian, Dr. Czapky, is intimately connected, I attach no importance to it whatsoever, from the fact that the two gentlemen did not part friends at their last meeting.

Thus far in the voyage I like the Sacramento very much. It is rather early to speak very positively of the qualities of the officers, but they all appear competent to their duties, and I could suggest few or no improvements in the way in which they navigate and handle the ship. All are unusually good-looking men; Captain Caverly—commonly pronounced Cavalry, as though he belonged to the fabulous regiment of horse marines—being quite a favorite with the ladies. Dick Bevil—so-called because he once and awhile has a rather sharp edge on him—purser, presides at the head of the table where I have the honor of eating, doing the honors with that grace which is born to a man—not made.

While speaking of tables, let me remark upon our fare. I must confess myself surprised at its excellence. With the single exception of coffee—which is not as good as I have drank at good restaurants and in private families, though quite on a par with what is commonly found at the hotels—no complaint could reasonably be made. And yet I have heard several grumble and growl, and wonder why a better table is not spread. According to my way of putting it up, these fault-finders are living a deal better than ever they did at home. To expect fresh vegetables every morning at sea, and all the delicacies which the market on shore affords, is the height of folly. The chief complaint that suggests itself to me in connection with the tables, is the fact that they are always spreading them, to the great discomfort of one who has the voluminous correspondence upon his hands which falls to my lot.

Verily, the clergyman had no opportunity to write a sermon for Sunday, so we had to be content with a reading of the Episcopal service, and singing of a choir, Charlie Shultz presiding at the piano and Emily Thorne leading the vocal music.

That Shultz is more accustomed to lead an orchestra than to direct church music is a fact which need not be enlarged upon; but still he did very well, though a few operatic variations, accidentally introduced into such standard old tunes as "Old Hundred" and "Dundee," contributed in no small degree to the astonishment of the congregation.

But the singing was a deal better than the reading. Never did I hear the beautiful service of the Episcopal church so mangled and murdered by being trumpeted through a nose unprovided with keys and stops to give a proper modulation. How can any clergyman in this century cling to the see-saw, droning, Simon-says-thumbs-up style of delivery that was considered the thing in the primitive days of the pulpit? The doctor—who "spelled" the clergyman when the throat (or should I say the nose?) of the latter failed him, did decidedly better, though it must be confessed that he read the divine prescription for salvation as though it were one selected at random from the pages of his pharmacopœia. And very few will contend that "Forgive us for the sins we have done, and also for the sins we have not done" is the correct reading of any part of the service. But the doctor did marvellously well considering. His degree should be that of M.D. D.D.

One great fault with the conduct of this ship is the little latitude that is allowed to passengers, though they pretend to give us the latitude and longitude regularly, in connection with the distance run, each day. They won't let us sling hammocks about decks and shoot porpoises when they come along. The use of firearms is prohibited on the vessel, and, to borrow an old joke, I wish the use of children in arms was also forbidden.

We have about half an opera troupe and a whole theatrical one aboard, but as yet no performance has been brought out, though The Ship's Foot might very well be produced. "Don Guzman," who has recovered from a slight spell of sea sickness, and now declares that she is as brave as her sword or a swordfish, and "Signorina Leonora," declare their willingness to resume their roles, and "Don Nigodinus," for proof of his readiness to assist, refers everybody to "Lazarillo."

Thus far very little has occurred to break the monotony of the voyage. Occasionally a few porpoises happen along—kicking up their heels as though by accident, but really doing it a-porpoise—trying to emulate the marvellous gymnastic feats which the Buislay brothers do. And they come pretty near those wonderful acrobats, standing on their heads and throwing hand-springs and double somersets as though they had been doing nothing else all their lives—which I really think they haven't.

I had several other things to say, but the circumstances are not favorable for composition. By special kindness I prevailed on the powers that rule the main saloon to permit a lamp to burn until this letter is finished, but according to the present showing it would have to burn till all eternity, for a convivial party has suddenly appeared upon the scene—or rather appeared upon the scene about an hour ago—and the festive sound of champagne corks has pleasantly variegated the sonorous snores from ponderous sleeping noses. Several times I have written in snatches of the conversation that is buzzing about, and as they would not prove eminently interesting to your readers, should you come across any, please to cross them out. We are all going ashore in the morning, and a little wine is said to be an excellent thing for the stomach's ache in this region. Good night. INIGO.

MR. W. C. BENNETT proposes to collect into a single work "A Ballad for the English People," to be composed in the first place, of such metrical pieces as already exist in illustration of the national deeds; in the second place, of such pieces as he may either write himself or induce other persons to write, in fulfilment of the general design. Many events in history—most of them legendary English—are already celebrated in such verses as "Chevy Chace" and the Robin Hood ballads. Mr. Bennett invites the poets of England and America to assist him in completing the series, so as to present a full history of the English race, in metre.

THE San Francisco Olympic Club gave their anniversary ball last evening at Platt's Hall. The "anniversaries" of the club have always been largely attended, and doubtless the members last night had belles more interesting than their usual dumb ones.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE arrival of the eminent tragedian, Edwin Forrest, is a notable event in the dramatic history of San Francisco. No other actor could awaken among us so warm an interest in his art, or claim so many professional friends and admirers. Thousands who have witnessed his great impersonations in years gone by, have long looked forward with pleasure to his coming. For years he has been acknowledged as one of the greatest, if not the greatest of actors, and has been looked up to as the national champion of his profession. Macready, the elder Booth, and Kean, may have rivalled, or even excelled, Edwin Forrest in some characters, but in others he has always been deemed without a competitor. He is accompanied by Mr. J. McCullough and Miss Lillie, who will support him during his engagement, and give additional strength to the Opera House company. The Opera House is now undergoing a very thorough course of renovation and improvement, to add to the capacity and convenience of the auditorium. The Forrest season will not open until these improvements are completed, which will probably be two weeks hence.

At the Academy of Music, that excellent play, Lost in London has been most excellently played all the week, and will give place to Tom Taylor's drama, Henry Dunbar, for this afternoon's and this evening's performances. Mrs. Saunders' farewell benefit last night—previous to her departure for New York and other villages at the East—was an actually overflowing testimonial to her popularity, the house not being able to contain all applicants for admission. We will not harrass our own and the reader's feelings by making a pathetic appeal to the lady to revoke her intended departure and tarry still longer with us, as much as we admire her sterling qualities; for we believe such an appeal would not effect its object, and we would only be wasting our own and the reader's time by so doing.

The new play—Henry Dunbar—is a dramatic version of Miss Braddon's novel of The Outcast, which was published in both of our Sunday papers some four years since. The story was an exceedingly popular one, and full of action; and in the experienced hands of Tom Taylor can hardly fail of making a very attractive play.

The performance of Ireland Shall be Free was brought to a sudden termination at the Metropolitan on Tuesday night, by the "Thomas Francis Meagher" of the piece getting up a real little revolution of his own, and refusing to play unless his salary was fully paid him—thereby revolutionizing the piece, and dethroning the manager. Such is the dangerous tendency of plays which teem with revolutionary sentiment, and are calculated to "fire the (actor's) heart." There was a great difference between the run of the Irish play and that of its French predecessor, though not much as regards the literary merits of the two. The principal points of distinction lay in their national characteristics, the one being full of Irish breeches parts, and the other of French breechless ones. Could this little difference in the two plays account for the measure of popularity respectively achieved?

Mrs. Sedley Brown has leased the Metropolitan and has been making great preparations all the week to bring out the Mountain Sylph in a style of beauty and splendor that will exceed, it is said, anything hitherto produced in the spectacular line. It was intended to perform the piece this afternoon and evening, but its proper production necessitates a postponement of it until Monday night. Quite an army of carpenters, machinists and painters have been at work all the week upon the scenic portions of the piece, and some of its effects will be very novel. The second act will terminate in a grand illuminated tableaux and a "Bed of Flame." The third act will give a mountain view, occupying the whole height and depth of the Metropolitan stage. Then there will be Salamandrine caverns, Aerial cars, Bridal Processions, and a grand heterogeneous display of wizards, witches, sylphs, and imps; the whole to be enlivened by a liberal addition of concerted musical pieces and choruses, arranged by conductor Evans, and to be sung by Signor Carmini Morley, Mrs. Sedley Brown, Mrs. Julia Gould, Mr. Stephen Leach, and the Quartette from "The Twelve."

The Cosmopolitan Circus opened on Thursday evening, under the management of Messrs. Lee & Ryland, to a crowded tent. The Buislay, the Siegrist, and the Lee families, with Messrs. Ryland, Franklin, and Dave Long, filled the bill of a long and exceedingly satisfactory performance. The combination is an excellent one, and the programme varied and entertaining. This will be the last opportunity the public will have to see the Buislays in their startling feats, as they leave on the next steamer. Performances will be given this afternoon and evening, and every evening next week, with a change of programme each evening. The trained dogs and monkeys will perform for the little folks this afternoon.

"MAZEPPA," a new opera by Pedrotti, has had success in Venice. The composer was summoned no fewer than sixteen times on the stage with acclamations.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats, and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much hetter; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

THE CHOLERA.

[The following succinct report on the Cholera—its prevention and treatment—was prepared for the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York by an eminent physician, and is copied from the twenty-third annual report of that Company.]

In view of the fact that the Cholera has made some progress in Europe and the West India islands during the past year, and may probably visit portions of our own country, it is deemed proper that this Report should contain some practical suggestions as to its causes, prevention, and early treatment.

A few remarks from an able writer on this subject are worthy of attention: "Such is the well-founded assurance of personal security from cholera, when the principles of Hygiene and the means of proper care are practically understood, that no physician of good judgment and intelligence fears to visit any city or place where cholera prevails, or to remain at his post of professional duty in the midst of an epidemic of the disease, for he knows that the exciting causes of cholera are avoidable, and that its premonitary stages can be very certainly arrested if the general health and personal habits are good. Nothing could better illustrate the value of proper attention to personal health and daily habits. In short, cholera, as a pestilence, must be regarded as a preventible disease."

In preparing the following remarks, it has been our object to present the matter in a simple, untechnical, and practical manner. We have, nevertheless, availed ourselves of the services of a gentleman who, in the course of his medical experience in the East, has encountered three several epidemics of cholera, and we therefore feel confidence in the accuracy and value of the statements made and instructions given.

CAUSES.

These may be divided into epidemic and those due to atmospheric and other local influences. The places where its ravages are most fatal are just those where typhus-fever, diarrhœa, and other diseases, showing the influence of foul air, dampness, and want of suitable drainage, are most common. So true is this, that an experienced physician could indicate, with considerable certainty, the points it would seize upon long before its advent. Such causes as are under our control should be immediately attended to and removed.

PREVENTION.

Accumulations of filth, street rubbish, mud, stable-dirt, etc., foul drains and cesspools, neglected privies and stagnant pools of water, ought to be carefully removed. Every house, public and private, should be carefully cleansed, and all the house drainage and privies kept thoroughly clean. The fermenting exhalations from these are particularly to be dreaded as a means of inducing a visit of cholera.

When the epidemic influence of cholera surrounds us, anything which alters the normal healthy standard of the body predisposes to disease. For, instance, the use of unwholesome food, impure water, intemperance, undue exposure to the night air, and want of proper personal cleanliness. The body should be protected against sudden changes of temperature. Wear flannel, and in the summer season a broad flannel band, extending from the top of the hips to the middle of the body. Persons should eat heartily, without overloading the stomach; but the food should be plain in quality and thoroughly cooked. Fruits and vegetables should not be eaten unless cooked, as one of the most frequent sources of an attack of cholera is the indulgence in a meal of fruit or uncooked vegetables. Avoid great nervous fatigue and loss of sleep, and discourage panic. In the premonitary stage cholera is usually curable.

SYMPTOMS OF AN ATTACK.

Cholera, in the majority of cases, begins with a premonitory diarrhœa. This is a fact of the greatest importance. When the disease is fully established, medicine has not so much control over it; but in the beginning it is easily subdued. Neglect of this diarrhœa will allow it to run on into severe and uncontrollable cholera. After the diarrhœa has lasted for some time the evacuations assume a peculiar appearance, which is best described by the term usually applied to them as "rice-water discharges." The patient at times will also vomit a similar matter. Should the disease proceed further, the state termed collapse supervenes. The pulse becomes frequent and feeble, or may not be perceivable at the wrist; the body is cold or bluish, and presents a shrunken appearance. The skin is shrivelled and bathed in a cold sweat. There is cramp of the muscles of the calves of the legs and thighs, rendering them rigid, and drawing the muscles of the abdomen into knots. These contractions are attended with severe pain, and form, indeed, the greater part of the patient's suffering. Persons who are careless frequently go about for a day or two with a slight diarrhœa upon them, and, when too late, seek a physician's advice.

TREATMENT.

There has been much diversity of opinion on this head, but fortunately the medical profession are now agreed as to the method of meeting the first advances of this dread disorder. Of course, it would be criminal neglect not to send for a physician at once, for whatever remedies are used, and whatever their value, the practical eye and judgment of an experienced physician are needed to discriminate the proper time for their use, and to judge of the peculiar wants of each case. However, as time is all-important in grappling with such a foe, the remedies should be at hand to meet the physician at once. When any diarrhœa shows itself, it should be treated by rest in bed, where warmth and a pure atmosphere can be be found, if possible. This is most important. The diet should be plain, and the following prescription may be used to check the diarrhœa: Laudanum, two drachms: tincture of camphor, two drachms; and tincture of capsicum, two drachms; mix, and give of this thirty drops, or one half a teaspoonful, four times a day, if the disorder is mild. In a severe case, with much purging, the same dose may be given as often as every two hours, with an injection, consisting of half a tea-cupful of starch with half a tea-spoonful of laudanum; this may be injected three or four times in the course of the day. The excrementitious matter from the sick should be disinfected immediately, by means of carbonate of lime, sulphate or protochloride of iron, coal-tar, carbonic acid, or permanganate of potash; and let no person directly use the place into which such materials are emptied while cholera is prevailing. Whenever practicable let the matter be deeply buried in the earth, and immediately covered with quicklime or coal-tar and gravel. Let all the vessels and clothing used by the patients be cleansed with boiling water and soap. When the patient is cold, and the body is covered with cold sweat, showing symptoms of the collapse, the use of the medicine before indicated should be discontinued. If it be possible to give a hot bath, as hot as it can possibly be borne, this should be done, and the patient kept in it for ten or fifteen minutes, and then put to bed and covered with blankets. Mustard-plasters should be applied to the calves of the legs and thighs, and friction made over the whole abdomen and lower chest with tincture of capsicum, ammoniated liniment, or spirits of turpentine. The thirst may be relieved by giving ice-water in small quantities, or better still, by giving small lumps of ice. Whatever is done, do not give brandy, wine, or any stimulants of the sort, as it will be sure to do harm. In this stage of the disease, it is best not to give any medicine, unless a physician is at hand to judge of its advisability, as the injudicious administration of drugs may do much harm. The idea of contagion should be abandoned. Great fatigue, loss of sleep at night (from whatever cause,) extreme nervousness, fear, and an imprudent and improper mode of life, are generally the active agents in the field, predisposing to and getting the person ready for the foe.

In conclusion, we beg to remind the reader that the foregoing hints are only the skirmishers, to keep the enemy at bay until the "regular army," the active, intelligent physician, can get on the field. Send for him at once, then. Remember that an ounce of prevention is worth a great many pounds of cure in this disease, and that it, of all others, demands immediate, prompt, and active treatment, which we insist can only be afforded by a medical man.

THE JEW.

The present physical, moral, and social condition of the Jews must be a miracle. We can come to no other conclusion. Had they continued, from the commencement of the Christian era down to the present hour in some such national state in which we find the Chinese, walled off from the rest of the human family, and by their selfishness on a national scale, and their repulsions of alien elements, resisting every assault from without in the shape of hostile invasion, and, from an overpowering national pride, forbidding the introduction of new and foreign customs, we should not see so much mystery interwoven with their existence. But this is not their state—far from it. They are neither an united and independent nation, nor a parasitic province. They are peeled, and scattered, and crumbled into fragments, but, like the broken globules of quicksilver, instinct with a cohesive power, ever ready to amalgamate. Geography, arms, genius, politics, and foreign help do not explain their existence; time and climate, and customs equally fail to unravel. None of these are or can be the springs of their perpetuity. They have been spread over every part of the habitable globe; they have lived under the regimé of every dynasty, they have shared the protection of just laws and the proscriptions of cruel ones, and witnessed the rise and progress of both; they have used every tongue, and lived in every latitude. The snows of Laplaud have chilled, the suns of Africa scorched them. They have drunk the Tiber, the Thames, the Jordan, the Mississippi. In every country and every degree of latitude and longitude we find a Jew. It is not so with any other race. Empires the most illustrious have fallen, and buried the men that constructed them; but the Jew has lived among the ruins, a living mounment of indestructibility. Persecution has unsheathed the sword and lighted the fagot. Christian hatred and Moslem barbarism have smote, with unsparing ferocity, penal rescripts and deep prejudice have visited on them most unrighteous chastisement, and notwithstanding all they survive. Like their own bush on Mount Horeb, Israel has continued in the flames, but unconsumed. They are the aristocracy of Scripture, reft of their coronets—princes in degradation. A Babylonian, a Theban, a Spartan, an Athenian, are names known in history only; their shadows alone haunt the world and flicker on its tablets. A Jew walks every street, dwells in every capital, traverses every exchange, and relieves the monotony of the nations of the earth.

The race has inherited the heir-loom of immortality, incapable of extinction or amalgamation. Like streamlets from a common head, and composed of waters of a peculiar nature, they have flowed along every stream without blending with it or receiving its color or its flavor, and traversed the surface of the globe, to the close of the many centuries, peculiar, distinct, alone. The Jewish race at this day is perhaps the most striking seal of the truth of the sacred oracles. There is no possibility of accounting for their perpetual isolation, their depressed but distinct being, on any grounds save those revealed in the Record of Truth. Their aggregate and individual character is as remarkable as their circumstances. Meanness the most abject, and pride the most overbearing—the degredation of helots, and yet a conscious and manifest sense of the dignity of a royal priesthood—crouching, cozening, squeezing, grasping on the Exchange, in the shop, in the world, with nothing too low for them to do, or, notwithstanding, in the synagogue, looking back along many thousand years to ancestry beside which that of our peers and princes is but of yesterday, regarding justly Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as their great progenitors, and pressing forward on the wings of faith and hope, and promise, to a long-expected day, when they, now kings and princes in disguise, shall become so indeed by a manifestation the most glorious, and a dispensation the most sublime. The people are a perpetual miracle—a living echo of Heaven's holy tones, prolonged from generation to generation.—Frazer's Magazine.

FUNNYGRAPHIC.

Man leads woman to the altar—in that act his leadership begins and ends.

A dentist at work in his vocation, always looks down in the mouth.

Why is a marriage-certificate like an article the public could not do without? Because it is a noose-paper.

A man who bumps his head against that of his neighbor is not apt to think that "two heads are better than one."

Why are the snows of Mont Blanc like a ship-builder? Because they can avalanche (have a launch) whenever they get ready.

A "down-east" Yankee has recently invented a rat exterminator, consisting of a sort of powder-stuff. The animal jerks his head off at the third sneeze!

A young lady, intending to paint her cheeks with rouge, put some of the paint on her nose, and did not discover the accident until she was requested to "sign the pledge!"

A young man advertises in a city paper for a place as salesman, and says he has had a good deal of experience, having been discharged from seven different warehouses within a year.

"What is the difference between me and a new novel?" inquired a highly-rouged damsel of her beau. "It is this," said he: "a novel is read because it is interesting; you are interesting because you are red."

If you are back-bitten and annoyed, take example by your boots, which, although blackened almost every day, shine the more brightly, and which endure every rub without a murmur.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York.—In regard to this company the "Wall Street Underwriter" says: "Figures are potent arguments to employ in dealing with the affairs of any Insurance Company. The Twenty-Third Annual Report of 'The Mutual,' made up to the first of February instant, is published in this paper, and the results manifested upon it are well worthy of consideration. In the first instance, as the prime result of the past year's work, the gross assets of 'The Mutual' show an Increase of	$2,549,871 02

Total increase in premium account is	1,083,565 34
The total income of $3,853,065 80 is an increase of	1,003,199 24
The full disbursements for 1860, were	1,540,130 63
Number of policies issued Feb. 1865 to Feb. 1866, were 8,600—over double the number of 1864, and insuring over double the amount, viz.	31,394,407 00

All approving comment seems bald in the presence of the truly eloquent figures presented by the 'Mutual Life.' No record of success can be more complete for any financial institution in the world. Wherever Life Insurance has been heard of on the American Continent, the name and prestige of the great 'Mutual' of New York, stand out pre-eminent. Many successful modern companies have grown up to prosperity through the example and influence of the 'Mutual Life.' Its great success, its wealth, and its manifest advantages have been constantly referred to as incontrovertible arguments in favor of Life Insurance." "The Mutual Life" has paid losses on this coast (including dividends,) during the last four years, to the amount of $101,819 02, and among the recent losses to be paid are policies for $5,000 each, of Francis E. Webster and W. L. Haven, who were both killed by the nitro-glycerine explosion at the office of Wells, Fargo & Co., in addition to which amounts, there is to be paid about $1,200 for accrued dividends.—S. F. Examiner.

AGUA DE MAGNOLIA.

A toilet delight. Superior to any cologne. used to bathe the face and person, to render the skin soft and fresh, to allay inflammation, to perfume clothing, for headache, etc. It is manufactured from the rich Southern Magnolia, and is obtainiug a patronage quite unprecedented. It is a favorite with actresses and opera singers. It is sold by all dealers, at $1.00 in large bottles, and by DEMAS BARNES & Co., New York, Wholesale Agents.

Lyon's Magnetic Insect Powder will exterminate Fleas, Ticks, Roaches and all insects almost instantly. Its reputation is well known, and hence has been counterfeited. Inquire for and take none but LYON'S, bearing the stamp of DEMAS BARNES & Co., and the signature of E. LYON.

"OUT OF SORTS" expresses the feelings of many that cannot be otherwise described. Languor, weakness, enervation, listlessness, sleepiness, melancholy, want of appetite, etc., compose a class of ailments greater than all others combined. It is exactly for these indescribable complaints that PLANTATION BITTERS are prepared. It is for the relief of these same complaints they have become so famous. Hence it is that they are so extensively used by clergymen, merchants, ladies, and persons of sedeutary habits. They are as pleasant to the taste as they are beneficial to the Stomach. The extent of their sale is almost incredible.

Intrinsic virtue alone could ever insure the success met by the Mexican Mustang Liniment. For Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Cuts, Bruises, Burus, Swellings, etc., upon man, or Spavin, Ringhoue, Poll Evil, Scratches, Straius, etc., upon beasts, its effects are iustantaneous, soothing and wonderful. It saves time, suffering and expense to have it always in the house. None genuine unless in a steel plate label, with signature of G. W. Westhrook, and having stamp of DEMAS BARNES & Co., over top. Sold by all dealers.

Lyon's Kathairon is a most delightful article as a Hair Dressing—to eradicate scurf and dandruff, to keep it clean, soft and silky. and the head cool. It also prevents the hair from falling off and turning gray, and promotes its growth upon prematurely bald heads. It is sold by all dealers.

E. THOMAS LYON, N. Y.

LYON'S EXTRACT OF PURE JAMAICA GINGER—for Indigestion, Nausea, Heartburn, Sick Headache, Cholera Morbus, Flatulency, etc., where a warming stimulant is required. Its careful preparation and entire purity make it a cheap and reliable article for culinary purposes. Sold everywhere, at 50 cents per bottle. Ask for "LYON'S" Pure Extract. Take no other.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office, 712 Montgomery street, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

CONCORD WAGONS AND HARNESS.—The Pacific Concord Carriage Manufactory is prepared to supply the Pacific Coast with Concord wagons and harness made to order. The members comprising this firm have long been in the employ of the celebrated manufacturing house of L. Downing & Son, Concord, New Hampshire; so that parties wishing Concord wagons or harness can obtain just the same quality of article here and save 25 per cent. on their purchase money. We have seen some of their workmanship, and can recommend it to the public Address Belduke & Co., 820 Folsom street, between Fourth and Fifth.—San Francisco Leader.

DAINTY WORK.—About the daintiest work we ever saw were specimens of hair jewelry at the establishment of Mrs. C. Cook, 645 Clay street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets, yesterday. This lady manufactures all sorts of jewelry—watch-chains, earrings, finger rings, breastpins, and various other kinds of ornaments—from human hair. We witnessed the process of manufacture, and it is intricate and ingenious in the highest degree.—S. F. Examiner.

WANTED—Agents to sell, by subscription only the most popular work ever written: "GRANT AND SHERMAN; their Campaigns and Generals." By the world-renowned historian, Hon. J. T. Headley, author of Washington and his Generals, Sacred Mountains, etc. Agents are taking as high as thirty subscribers per day, and all agree in pronouncing it the most saleable work they ever took hold of. The people want Headley's illustrated "GRANT AND SHERMAN," etc. For terms and territory, address E. E. SHEAR, No. 8 Montgomery Street, and Box 1,430, San Francisco, California

BUGGIES AND CARRIAGES.—If you want a trim neat, light, and yet durable style of buggy or carriage, go to Nos. 37 and 39 Webb street, between Sacramento and California, where you will find just such a vehicle as will suit your taste. POLLARD & CARVILL not only deal in these articles, but manufacture them to order, and do repairing, painting, trimming and blacksmithing with dispatch and neatness. Go and see them.—California Leader.

WAGONS.—Every species of wagons that any one can need, made of the best material, well fitted and finished, can be found at the Depot of MILLS & EVANS, 587 Market street, two doors from Second. Light, Express, Milk and Thoroughbrace wagons, also Lumber Gears, Extra Poles and Whiffletrees, with Lead Bars, are kept constantly on hand.—California Leader.

FOR the best finished, fashionable hats, go to McGann & Co.'s, Hatters, 654 Washington street, two doors below the Plaza.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend, JOSEPH SPARROW.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

HALL'S SARSAPARILLA,

YELLOW DOCK AND IODIDE POTASS,

Best Blood Purifier Known.

Persons that are troubled with Rheumatism, Scrofula, Neuralgia, Morbid Liver, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Boils, or any of the many diseases that originate from Impure Blood, would find it much to their advantage to give this justly celebrated article a trial. One or two bottles are quite sufficient to convince the most skeptical of its merits. It contains neither Spirit, ARSENIC nor MERCURY which cannot be truly said of any other preparation called "Sarsaparilla."

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

CALL AND SEE THE MACHINES WORK!

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but, we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION,

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,

FOUR HUNDRED HOMESTEAD LOTS!
ON THE ENCINAL, AT ALAMEDA STATION,
FRONTING THE PARK HOTEL AND THE RAILROAD.

This Land all lies level, and is covered with Live Oak Trees, and the soil is unsurpassed for Gardening purposes.

The location is within a short distance by Rail of the Boat Landing, and can be reached in 45 minutes from the city.

The attention of parties desiring Homesteads away from the dust of the city is called to this desirable property. The climate of the Encinal is the finest within Fifty miles of San Francisco, and the land which we now offer for sale is in the warmest and most pleasant location there to be found.

The subdivisions are of a good size, and parties desiring large tracts will have an opportunity to purchase as many contiguous lots as they may wish.

Each lot will be staked out, thus saving purchasers the expense of surveying.

Go and look at this property previous to the day of sale, as there will surely be a fine chance for investment. In a few years there must be a large population residing on the Encinal, owing to its many and surpassing advantages, and then lands will have enhanced greatly in value.

AMERICAN HUMOR.

THE North American Review, in a notice of Artemus Ward's last book, makes the following plain and outspoken criticism on the Showman's style:

"Artemus Ward has played the part of the literary clown with such success, that what he is now best known by is not the quaint oddity of his jests, but the slang which he adopted and introduced, his tone of impudent familiarity in speaking of distinguished persons, the twisting of his words, and the nonsensical form of his sentences. This has tickled the fancy of such as are content to be amused cheaply with ungrammatical phrases, burlesque words, and silly impertinence. The great test of the genuine buffoon is that he makes you laugh, and he must have no object but laughter; if he has an end in view, he loses his character—for the buffoon, as buffoon, is always shallow. Humor would have you laugh with, buffoonery at, itself. The buffoon's want of self-respect is painfully noticeable in Artemus Ward. To the natural love of buffoonery, then, and, worse, to that taste for levity in our society, which, however natural as the opposite of an unnatural extreme, is still itself extreme—a levity that pastes bills on monuments, and makes natural scenery an advertising agent for quack medicines—Artemus Ward has pandered.

"To grin through a literary horse-collar of slang and bad spelling—to be a negro minstrel among authors—with such a station he was content for a long time; but at length, desirous of achieving a more creditable reputation, he attempted to get it by abandoning cap and bells, and he now appears before the world, in the last part of these "Travels," no longer as Artemus Ward, the showman, but in his own character as the humorist, Mr. Browne. Alas! the two veins of humor and buffoonery which we might have supposed accidentally combined, and separable, he now proves to be mingled in grain. The attempt was praiseworthy; but when he gave up the motley with which his humor had been clothed, it died of the exposure. With Artemus Ward laughter was too often the end, not the means; with Mr. Browne, in his commendable but fatal attempt at high comedy, the only end which it seems possible he can propose either to his readers or himself is that of his book.

"In presenting himself as the author of a book Mr. Browne, indeed, subjected his powers to a hard test, for the articles of which his volume is made up are in their nature ephemeral, and belong properly to the weekly papers in which they first appeared. The genius of such writers as Artemus Ward, Petroleum V. Nasby, Orpheus C. Kerr, Josh Billings, and Francis Bret Harte is specially appropriate to the flying pages of the comic journal. We may hope that at some day all these—Nasby, with his rich vein of political satire, which so delighted Mr. Lincoln that he said he had offered to change places with him; Orpheus C. Kerr, liberal in politics, a good parodist, a capital writer of burlesque; Harte, a parodist of such genius that he seems a mirror into which novelists may look and be warned; and Josh Billings, with his wise saws and modern instances—will, instead of letting their humor ooze out of the soil at unexpected times and places, send it forth from one great fountain-head, to flow over and enrich the thirsty land."

To this might be added the name of Mark Twain, an humorist as original as Phœnix, and superior to Artemus Ward.

SELF-MADE MEN OF OUR DAY.

BY "BRET."

No. 1.—SYLVESTER JAYHAWK.

THE birth and parentage of the subject of our sketch is involved in some obscurity. If we may ask for Homer some credit, from the fact that five cities claimed the honor of his birthplace, a decent respect is due to our hero, whose parentage is alleged to have been divided among as many individuals. The name of Jayhawk cannot be traced beyond the present possessor, but, as the peculiar and arduous nature of his putative father's pursuits often rendered an alias necessary, this fact should not militate against the antiquity of the family. It is believed that, in conformity with an aboriginal custom, the title of "Jayhawk" might have been bestowed on our hero in recognition of certain accipterine qualities which he possessed in common with that energetic, but ingenuous fowl.

Of his early boyhood we know but little. That it was not entirely devoid of interest, or of a prophetic nature, we have every reason to believe. "I disremember," said Mr. Jayhawk, in conversation with a high county official a few days previous to his decease, "I disremember much before I shot a nigger. It was in Missouri, when I was about 14. I had no call to kill him in partikler," he repeated, thoughtfully; "he was worth more'n three hundred dollars, and the old man kinder fancied him." The tender and regretful manner in which Mr. Jayhawk was accustomed to allude to this act of boyish folly furnishes us a convincing proof of that cautious judgment and economical application of power which distinguished him in after years. He had "no call" to kill this helpless African; his older and more critical judgment, looking back upon an active and not altogether useless life, saw much to regret in this gratuitous and reckless waste of destructive energy. How many of us have been guilty of committing some indiscretion for which we had "no call;" how few of us have had the sincerity to regret it as frankly and openly as the truthful Jayhawk.

We follow young Sylvester from his paternal home to the State of Kansas. With no other property than a knife and pistol he early faced the cold world and began his career. Even the horse he rode was not his own, but borrowed permanently from a neighbor. An incident of his departure which he was fond of relating, beautifully illustrates the depths of maternal affection, and the prophetic promptings of a mother's heart. "As I rode away, the old woman heaved arter me what I reckoned was a rock. I picked it up and found it was a paper parsil. That 'ere parsil I have kep to this day." On being interrogated as to its contents, Mr. Jayhawk, with that quaint humor which was peculiar to him would reply, "It warn't a Bible. It was an old deck of the old man's—the identical deck of keerds with which he won Sam Handy's colt and niggers." Some commentators have looked upon this act of the maternal Jayhawk as ill-advised and perhaps indiscreet. But who shall fathom the mysterious logic of a mother's heart. Perhaps some instinctive premonition of his future occupation—perhaps the mere desire to gratify a beloved son, determined this gift. It is certain that Sylvester never forgot it, and when, returning a few years later in his professional capacity, he burned up the family homestead and both of his parents, he seems to have experienced some regret on gazing at the remains of Mrs. Jayhawk. "She was always good to me," he remarked to a reverend gentleman with whom he conversed some days before his death, "and we found no money on her. I couldn't help thinking about her giving me them keerds, and how foolish it was in me to have forgotten that she kept her money in an old stocking."

In Kansas, our hero seems to have taken a partner in the prosecution of his profession, and to have connected himself with the celebrated Col. McSnaffle. But the self-reliant, disposition and independent character of Jayhawk could not long brook the alliance. In an address to a committee of the citizens of Lawrence, who waited upon him beyond the confines of the town, Sylvester alluded to the circumstances of his separation from Col. McSnaffle. "When we found we couldn't get along together, we agreed to divide our money and separate. I counted out three hundred dollars apiece, and divided the weapons. McSnaffle wanted to give me five hundred, and take the weapons himself. But," said Mr. Jayhawk, with playful irony, "I didn't see it. We then shook hands and parted like men, each man a-walking backwards until he was out of rifle shot. Being in a hurry, I kinder forgot myself and turned my back too soon, and when I faced round again, he had me covered! He was a mighty smart man," he added, in a tone not entirely free from emotion; "and when I see that, I kinder felt sorry we had separated." Mr. Jayhawk seldom spoke of McSnaffle save in the highest terms, and cheerfully bore evidence—on behalf of the State—in regard to McSnaffle's professional zeal and character.

But it was in California that Sylvester found a fitting theatre for the exercise of his talent, and his career may have been said to have begun with his entry into this State. His advent was modest, and free from display or ostentation. The removal of several employees of the Overland Mail Company along the line, the quiet absorption of valuable mail matter, the permanent withdrawal of stock from the different stations, alone marked his progress. Talent of this high order at once commanded respect; he was retained by the Overland Company as one of their chief overseers; the unnecessary and irregular shedding of blood was in a measure checked, and an authoritative and systematized rule of slaughter substituted for wild and sporadic bloodshed. "It isn't as lively as it used to be," Mr. Jayhawk remarked to an intelligent traveller. "I killed ten men the first year I came to the Rocky Ridge station; but there's a kind o' falling off in sport." Later, during a temporary sojourn in Virginia City, he was enabled to prosecute his profession with less restraint. Here he fell a victim to an exalted but misguided ambition. "I had killed twenty-nine men up to the fall of 1860," he writes; "I wanted to finish the year with an even number. So I killed a man keerlessly and without forethought." This thoughtless act cost Mr. Jayhawk his life. A brilliant future was destroyed in a moment of unguarded enthusiasm.

From a portrait in the possession of a distinguished official of Nevada, Mr. Jayhawk seems to have been of middle height. His presence would have been more imposing, had his person exhibited the usual quantity of organs and members which the conventionalities of society seem to require. His one eye, in its depth and lustre, seemed to rebuke the popular prejudice which leaned in favor of two. Another portrait in the possession of the Chief of Police of San Francisco, though taken anterior to the Nevada picture, exhibits a much older man, and one whose hair is of entirely a different color. It is a singular instance of the difficulty with which facts in regard to prominent men are obtained, that the same number of fingers do not exist in any two portraits of Mr. Jayhawk. In one we find the nose entirely absent. The expression of our hero's face, though not intelligent, was mild and pleasing; the loss of his upper lip in a prize fight on the banks of the Carson led to the frequent and cheerful exhibition of his front teeth, and produced an open and not unpleasant breadth of feature. Mr. Jayhawk, although never married, left a large family to mourn his loss.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.—In St. Philip's Chapel, Winchester, England, a very old edifice, built long before the time of Henry VIII., there are ancient stall seats, affixed to the wall of the ante-chapel. These seats are so fixed upon hinges, that those who sit on them can only maintain their position by balancing themselves with care, and resting their elbows on the seat arms; so that if the old monks who used them dropped asleep during the service, the seat came forward and pitched them headlong on the floor; nay, if they only dozed and nodded the least in the world, the hard oaken seat clapped against the oaken back, and made noise enough to attract the attention of the whole congregation. This may serve as a hint to those who are at a loss how to keep awake in church.

A DAY IN BAD COMPANY.

I AM a country gentleman, or, as that description of myself may perhaps be a little too ambitious or too vague, let me modify it by saying that I reside in ——shire, and have sufficient means to enable me to live without occupation. Owing probably to this circumstance, I have acquired a certain indolence of disposition, which is shown in my conversation and bearing; even in my walk. I may as well add that I am forty-eight years of age, of somewhat sturdy build, and with a ruddy complexion, due no doubt to fresh air, regular habits, and a contented mind. This ruddiness and the somewhat homely style in which I invariably dress give me a rough, rural appearance, so that, in the eyes of the casual observer, I must seem to stand on a rather lower step in the social scale than I really occupy. Then, too, I am told by my friends, that the expression of my face is dull, some say even stupid. Upon this point I, of course, offer no opinion. I will merely say that the very people who thus describe me are quite agreed in admitting that I am not such a fool as I look.

When I am in town I am very fond of looking into the shop windows. It is an odd sort of taste, perhaps, for a full-grown man, who has been half over the world; but we all have our peculiarities, and that is one of mine. The old knight, Sir Thomas, in the "Ingoldsby Legends,"

> "Would pore by the hour
> O'er a weed, or a flower,
> Or the slugs that came crawling out after a shower;"

and, in like manner, do I pore over the articles displayed in the shop windows at the West End. I am never tired of it, in fact. This is a rather long exordium; but appears to me necessary to put the reader in possession of these facts as a preparation for what is to follow. And now to my story.

One day, in the height of the London season, I was sauntering through Regent street, indulging in my favorite occupation, when a gentleman just before me accidentally dropped his umbrella, and it fell within an inch of my toes. I have said he was a gentleman; but I ought perhaps to have said he was a decently dressed man, apparently from the country, very quiet and harmless-looking, not vulgar, but certainly not refined. In a word, he appeared about as much of a gentleman as myself, but not more.

"I really beg your pardon, sir," he said, as he turned quickly round and picked up the umbrella. "It was very careless of me. I hope you're not hurt?"

"Well," I replied, "as the umbrella didn't touch me I don't see how I well can be."

"I'm sure I'm very sorry," he continued, apologetically.

"Don't name it, don't name it," said I. "There's not the slightest harm done, and no need to apologize. Such little accidents will happen every day."

"Ah," he remarked, "you may well say that, sir, especially in London streets."

"Yes, they are tolerably crowded at this time of day, or any time, for that matter."

"And especially for a stranger to London," he added.

"O, you are a stranger to London, are you?" I remarked, and almost involuntarily cast a somewhat searching glance at him.

"Quite a stranger," he replied, with perfect simplicity of manner, and without appearing to notice my scrutinizing look. "I've only been here a few days, and, to say the truth, I sha'n't be sorry when I get back again into Norfolk." (He had something of the Norfolk manner.) "It's so very lonely not to know any one in a great place like this."

"It must be," I carelessly remarked, for I wanted to shake the fellow off.

At this point in our conversation we had arrived at a street corner, and I stopped, as a hint for my companion to go on. I hoped that, as he had no further excuse for talking to me, he would hasten his pace and leave me to saunter as before. But no. Evidently he was so glad to find some one to speak to that he was unwilling to part company so soon. He still kept by my side, therefore, and after some more conversation of the same character as the above, asked me if I had any objection to take a glass of ale with him. I had no need of a glass of ale just then, and felt no desire to have one with a perfect stranger; still the offer seemed well meant. I accordingly accepted it, and we entered the first tavern we found handy.

I wanted to pay for the ale, and had already taken out my purse to do so, but my companion seemed quite wounded by the proposal, and begged me to put my money back again. He had invited me in, he urged, and I was therefore his guest. The proposition was so reasonable that I had not a word to say against it, and at once gave up the point.

While we stood chatting at the bar on commonplace topics —the weather, the streets, and so on—a stranger entered and joined in our conversation almost before I had noticed his presence. I say he joined in our conversation, but I ought to add that in a very few minutes he took the lion's share of it.

Stranger No. 1 I have already described as looking only partly like a gentleman. Stranger No. 2, it may fairly be said, did not look like a gentleman at all. He was a big, burly fellow, with a rough pilot coat, though the weather was anything but cold; a profusion of whiskers and beard, clumsy, fat fingers, a large face, a low forehead, small eyes, and an expression of countenance made up in about equal proportions of intense stupidity and overwhelming self-conceit.

Stupid and self-conceited enough in all conscience he soon proved himself to be. His physical prowess was the theme on which he boasted most. There was nothing he was incapable of accomplishing. He could throw a weight farther than any one else, he could run faster and longer, he could jump higher; not a man in all England was his equal in athletic feats.

Stranger No. 1, who, as I said before, seemed a quiet inoffensive sort of man, was evidently annoyed by the intrusion of this vulgar fellow into our company, especially as he wanted to treat us to some sherry, and ostentatiously displayed a whole handful of gold and a pile of bank-notes, to show that he had the means. But when he began to boast of his physical powers, No. 1 was fairly warmed at what he evidently deemed mere empty brag, and took up the matter in earnest.

"I'll tell you what," he said, "I don't mind betting you half a sovereign that I'll throw a weight farther than you—any weight you like, and this gentleman here will no doubt kindly see all fair between us."

He referred, of course, to me.

"All right, I've not the slightest objection," said I.

"Come on, then," eagerly exclaimed No. 2, "I'm your man. Let's settle it at once."

But here an unexpected difficulty arose. The tavern we were in had not been built with any view of testing physical capacity, and accordingly there was no part of the premises in which accommodation had been provided for throwing weights. However, No. 2 soon suggested means of escape from this perplexity. He knew, he said, a "nice quiet little place" over the water, where we should find what we wanted, and a cab would take us there in no time. No. 1 looked appealingly at me, as though to ascertain if I would acquiesce in this arrangement, and as I offered no objection, we jumped into a cab, and drove off, crossing Waterloo Bridge, and soon becoming lost in the maze of obscure small streets which abound in that very choice part of London. Our ride did not occupy much time; but during that time No. 2 contrived to make us acquainted with the whole of his private history. Of this the principal and most interesting fact was, that his uncle had just died and left him a large fortune. He had been to the bank that day, he said, and drawn out some of the money; but there was plenty more left, and he meant to enjoy himself now, and no mistake about it. What was the good of money unless you spent it? etc., etc.

Here I may as well state, lest the reader should think me simpler than I am, that neither the quiet modesty of one of my companions, nor the boisterous braggadocio of the other, had deceived me as to their true character and object. Directly they fairly began to play their respective parts, directly I saw that my vulgar friend's sovereigns were card counters at a shilling a dozen, and that his notes were drawn upon the Bank of Engraving, I saw clearly enough I was in the hands of a couple of skittle sharpers, intent upon making me their victim. I had not the slightest intention of allowing them to gratify this very natural desire, but being anxious to see for myself something of the manners and the modus operandi of this class of men, of whom I had so often read in the police reports, I fell in with their humor, and allowed them to think me their dupe.

My boasting companion was still talking of his money, and of his intention to enjoy himself with it, when the cab pulled up at our destination. It was a small public house, in a shabby and secluded street; standing back some ten or fifteen yards from the footway, it was approached by a dismal little garden, or what had once been a garden, with a couple of summer-houses on one side, some tottering trellis-work on the other, and a few tables and benches scattered here and there on either side of the path. At the back of the house there was an open gravelled space, not quite so large as the plot in front, and at the bottom of this stood, as I had expected, a covered skittle alley, towards which we at once made our way.

The wealthy gentleman had been merely communicative and boastful in the cab, but directly he saw the skittles, all his swaggering recklessness at once returned. The first thing he wanted to do was to bet me five shillings that the ball was made, not of wood, but of metal.

"Why," said I, adapting the tone of my conversation to the company I was in. "you must be a fool to talk like that. Look here." And I took up the ball and chipped it with my penknife. "I tell you what it is, my friend," I added; "if you get making bets like that, you'll soon lose all your money, I can tell you."

This rebuke, uttered in a manner which in no way implied suspicion of either of my companions, inspired them both, I verily believe, with stronger confidence in their powers of deception, and their chance of fleecing me. I had been simple enough to refuse five shillings when they were, so to speak, thrust into my hands. Of what other weakness might I not be capable?

My remark, however, apparently produced no effect. In a few minutes, the swaggering gentleman was vaunting his powers as boisterously as ever, throwing out all sorts of wild challenges, and offering any number of ridiculous bets.

I ought, perhaps, to mention that there was one point upon which I certainly felt some apprehension. It was, lest anything I might drink with my companions should be drugged. While I remained in full possession of my faculties, I was quite sure of myself; but I had heard so much of the stupefying effects of drugged liquor, that I was by no means anxious to experience them in my own person. Accordingly, from the moment I entered the public house, I determined to take the refreshment department exclusively into my own hands.

"Now," said I to my modest companion, "you stood treat before, so it's my turn now. What are you going to have? I shall have some more ale. And what's your tipple, sir?" I asked, addressing the gentleman who had recently come into his uncle's money.

Well, he would have some cold gin-and-water, he said—he had not yet had time to acquire aristocratic tastes—and my other companion decided upon following my course and sticking to ale; so this matter was soon settled. As a measure of precaution and not of predilection, I fraternally drank out of the same pewter as No. 1, for we eschewed glasses, and took care that he always had the first draught. But I soon saw that neither he nor his confederate cared to drink themselves, or to make me drink. They were evidently on another tack.

It would weary rather than interest the reader, were I to describe all the attempts made by these two worthies to entrap me. Soon after we entered the public house we were joined by a third stranger, a lean young man of mild aspect and fawning manners, with whom the bragging gentleman after a while began to play at skittles. It became at once obvious, or was made to seem so, that the latter had not the slightest chance against the former. Yet, notwithstanding this circumstance, No. 2 made the most foolish bets with No. 1, and although he almost invariably lost, returned to the charge again and again, offering odds to me in the same reckless manner, and increasing his stakes with every fresh defeat. Keeping to the part I had at first assumed, I roughly refused all his offers; told him he was only throwing his money away, and that, if he didn't take care what sort of company he got into, he would assuredly be cleared out of all he possessed. When this sort of thing had gone on for about two or three hours, I ostentatiously pulled out a large and valuable gold watch, said I had an appointment in the city with a gentleman, who was to pay me some money—a statement which was perfectly true; expressed my regret that I could not stop any longer, and bade my companions adieu. That they were sorry to part with me I can readily believe; but, as I made an appointment to meet them the next day, so that we might all go to another "nice little place," a few miles out of town, they still had hope to fall back upon. They had failed for the time; but I feel convinced they were certain of success with me when we next met. When we next meet perhaps they may.

Before I close this paper, let me offer a few remarks. First, I feel bound to admit that better acting of its kind than that of these two fellows I never saw on or off the stage. It was carefully carried out from first to last, never lost sight of, and never overdone. While attempting to take me in, my two friends never exchanged knowing glances, or made signals to each other, or did anything, in fact, to arouse my suspicions. As for the lean young man, he kept in the background aloof from me, and was, I suppose, only an auxiliary hand. When the two leading performers found me somewhat tougher than they probably had expected, they expressed no surprise and no annoyance. We parted as though we had been sworn friends for years.

My impression is, that those who fall victims to this class of men are generally self-conceited persons who have an exaggerated idea of their own acuteness, an over-confident belief that they cannot be imposed upon. "Young men from the country" are famous for this kind of foolish presumption, and they are, of course, the easiest prey. Yet, within the circle of my own acquaintance, I knew a sensible young man, born and bred in London, who allowed himself to be duped in this manner. He was standing looking in at a shop-window, when a stranger of about his own age, soft-spoken and plausible, joined him, entered into a conversation, walked on with him, and finally asked him if he had ever played at skittles. The sensible young man replied in the negative. How curious! The stranger had never played, either. What fun it would be to see what sort of a game it was. To be brief, they went to a skittle-ground, played for some little time with varying success, the sensible young man ultimately losing the ten or fifteen shillings he had about him, and actually agreeing to go home to get some more money. While the excitement of the game lasted he had no suspicion he was being robbed. It was not until half an hour's walking in the fresh air had somewhat cooled him that he recognized the fact.

With many persons, too, such reckless stupidity and selfconceit as were exhibited by one of my companions form too alluring a bait to be resisted. Here is a vulgar, boasting fellow, overflowing with money, who is positively asking people to ease him of some of it, and who taunts them if they do not comply with his request.

Over and over again my modest friend looked at me, when the other was loudest in his boasting, and seemed to say. "What a fool! Did you ever meet with such a donkey?" Indeed, once he softly said to me, "I wonder you don't take his offer, sir. He seems determined to lose his money, and why shouldn't you win some of it?" This is the bait which, when all others—and there are plenty more—have been refused, rarely fails, I fancy, to be swallowed whole. Once taken, the rest must be easy work. Directly the dupe begins to lose, after having felt that to do so was impossible, his head appears to utterly fail him. He is seized with a sort of infatuation. In the January of this year, for instance, a "gentleman from the country" was induced to go and pawn his watch in order to test its genuineness; a bet, of which he was to have half, being the inducement. I recollect the case, too, of a tradesman, who, losing all he had about him, went home, and fetched £200 from his cash-box; staked that, so certain was he of winning, and of course soon found himself without a penny. I am inclined to think, therefore, that all, or nearly all, who are fleeced by such fellows as those I made the acquaintance of, are really the victims of their own desire to profit by what appears to be wrong-headed ignorance and stupidity. If ever I am myself taken in, perhaps I may change my opinion.

A HALF HOUR AT HERCULANEUM.

I.

THE road from Naples to Herculaneum is, in fact, one long street; it hardly ceases to be city in Naples till it is town at Portici, and in the interval it is suburb, running between palatial lines of villas, which have all their names ambitiously painted over their doors. Great part of the distance this street is bordered by the bay, and, as far as this is the case, it is picturesque, as everything is belonging to marine life in Italy. Everywhere sea-faring people go lounging up and down among the fishermen's boats drawn up on the shore, and the fishermen's wives making nets, and the fishermen's children playing and clambering over both, while over all flap and flutter the clothes hung on poles to dry. In this part of the street there are, of course, oysters, and grapes, and oranges, and cactus-pulps, and cutlery, and iced drinks to sell at various booths; and commerce is exceedingly dramatic and boisterous over the bargains she offers there; and equally, of course, murderous drinking shops lurk at intervals along the pavement, and lure into their recesses mariners of foreign birth, briefly ashore from their ships. The New York Coffee House is there to attract my maritime fellow-countrymen, and I know that if I look into that place of refreshment I shall see their honest, foolish faces flushed with drink, and the excitement of buying the least they can for the most money. Poor souls! they shall drink that pleasant morning away in the society of Antonino, the best of Neapolitans, and at midnight, emptied of every soldo, shall arise, wrung with a fearful suspicion of treachery, and wander away under Antonino's guidance to seek the protection of the consul; or, taking the law into their own hands, shall proceed to clean out, more Americano, the New York Coffee House, where Antonino shall develop into one of the landlords, and deal them the most artistic stab in Naples: handsome, worthy Antonino, tender-eyed, subtle, pitiless!

II.

WHERE the road to Herculaneum leaves the bay and its seafaring life, it enters, between the walls of lofty, fly-blown houses, a world of maccaroni haunted by foul odors, beggars, poultry and insects. There were few people to be seen on the street, but through the open doors of the lofty fly-blown houses we saw floury legions at work making maccaroni: grinding maccaroni, rolling it, cutting it, hanging it in mighty skeins to dry, and gathering it when dried, and putting it away. By the frequency of the wine-shops we judged that the legions were a thirsty host, and by the number of the barber-surgeons' shops that they were a plethoric and too full-blooded host. I think the latter were in the proportion of one to five of the former; and the artist who had painted their signs had indulged his fancy in wild excesses of phlebotomy. We had found that, as we came south from Venice, science grew more and more sanguinary in Italy, and more and more disposed to let blood. At Ferrara, even, the proponsity began to be manifest on the barbers' signs, which displayed the device of an arm lanced at the elbow, and jetting the blood by a neatly described parabola into a tumbler. Further south the same arm was seen to bleed at the wrist also; and at Naples an exhaustive treatment of the subject appeared, the favorite study of the artist being to represent a nude figure reclining in a genteel attitude on a bank of pleasant green sward, and bleeding from his elbows, wrists, hands, ankles, and feet.

Phlebotomy and the manufacture of maccaroni may be distinct branches of industry at Naples, and I do not deny that they are; but I have never in my own mind been able to dissociate them since the day of my ride to Herculaneum.

III.

IN Naples everywhere one is surprised by the great number of English names which appear on business-houses, but it was entirely bewildering to read a bill affixed to the gate of one of the villas on this road: "This Desirable Property for Sale." I should scarcely have cared to buy that desirable property, though the neighborhood seemed to be a favorite summer resort, and there were villas, as I said, nearly the whole way to Portici. Those villas which stood with their gardens towards the bay would have been tolerable, no doubt, if they could have kept their windows shut to the vile street before their doors; but the houses opposite could have had no escape from its stench and noisomeness. It was absolutely the filthiest street I have seen anywhere outside of New York, excepting only that little street which, in Herculaneum, leads from the theatre to the house of Argo. This pleasant avenue has a stream of turbid water in its centre, bordered by begging children, and is either fouler or cleaner for the water, but I shall never know which. It is a depth of some fifty or sixty feet below the elevation on which the present city of Portici is built, and is part of the excavation made long ago to reach the plain on which Herculaneum stands, buried under its half-score of successive layers of lava, and ashes, and Portici. We had the aid of all the virtuous poverty and leisure of the town—there was a vast deal of both, we found—in our search for the staircase by which you descend to the classic plain, and we found it a discovery involving the outlay of all the copper coin about us, while the sight of the famous theatre of Herculaneum was much more expensive than it would have been, had we come there in the old time to see a play of Plautus or Terence. As for the theatre, "the large and highly ornamented theatre" of which I read, only a little while ago, in an encyclopædia, we found it, by the light of our candles, a series of gloomy hollows, of the general complexion of coal-bins and potato-cellars. It was never perfectly dug out of the lava, and it is known how it was filled up, together with other excavations, when they once threatened to endanger the foundations of worthless Portici overhead. I am amused to find myself so hot upon the poor property-holders of Portici. I suppose I should not myself, even for the cause of antiquity and the knowledge of classic civilization, like to have my house tumbled about my ears. But though it was impossible in the theatre of Herculaneum to gain any idea of its size or richness, I remembered then the magnificent bronzes which had been found in it, and did a hasty reverence to the place. Indeed, it is amazing, when one sees how small a part of Herculaneum has been uncovered, to consider the number of fine works of art in the Museo Borbonico which were taken thence, and which argue a much richer and more refined community than that of Pompeii. A third of the latter city has now been restored to the light of day; but though it has yielded abundance of all the depravity of those old times, and given the one-secret rooms of the museum their worst attraction, it still falls far below Herculaneum in the value of its contributions to the treasures of classic art, except only in the variety and beauty of its exquisite frescoes. The effect of this fact is to stimulate the imagination of the visitor to that degree that nothing short of the instant destruction of Portici and the excavation of all Herculaneum will satisfy him. If the opening of one theatre, and the uncovering of a basilica and two or three houses, have given such richness to us, what delight and knowledge would not the removal of these obdurate hills of ashes and lava bestow!

Emerging from the coal-bins and potato-cellars, the visitor extinguishes his candle with a pathetic sigh, profusely rewards the custodian (whom he connects in some mysterious way with the ancient population of the injured city about him,) and, thoughtfully removing the tallow from his fingers, follows the course of the vile stream already sung, and soon arrives at the gate opening into the exhumed quarter of Herculaneum. And there he finds a custodian who enters perfectly into his feelings; a custodian who has once been a guide in Pompeii, but now despises that wretched town, and would not be guide there for any money, since he has known the superior life of Herculaneum; who, in fine, feels towards Pompeii as a Bostonian feels towards New York. Yet the reader would be wrong to form the idea that that there is bitterness in the disdain of this custodian. On the contrary, he is one of the best-natured men in the world. He is a mighty mass of pingeous bronze, with a fat lisp, and a broad, sun-flower smile, and he lectures us with a vast and genial breadth of manner on the ruins, contradicting all our guesses at things with a sweet "Perdoni, signori, ma ——." At the end, we find that he has some medallions of lava to sell: there is Victor Emanuel, or, if we are of the partito d'azione, there is Garibaldi; both warm yet from the crater of Vesuvius, and of the same material which destroyed Herculaneum. We decline to buy, and the custodian makes the national shrug and grimace (signifying that we are masters of the situation, and washes his hands of the consequences of our folly) on the largest scale that we have ever seen; his mighty hands are rigidly thrust forth, his great lip protruded, his enormous head thrown back to bring his face on a level with his chin. The effect is tremendous, but we, nevertheless, feel that he loves us the same.

IV.

THE afternoon on which we visited Herculaneum was in melancholy contrast to the day we spent in Pompeii. The lingering summer had at last saddened into something like autumnal gloom, and that blue, blue sky of Naples was overcast. So, this second draught of the spirit of the past had not only something of the insipidity of custom, but brought rather a depression than a lightness to our hearts. There was so little of Herculaneum: only a few hundred yards square are exhumed, and we counted the houses easily on the fingers of one hand, leaving the thumb to stand for the few rods of street that, with its flagging of lava and narrow border of footwalk, lay between; and though the custodian, apparantly moved at our dejection, said the excavation was to be resumed the very next week, the assurance did little to restore our cheerfulness. Indeed, I fancy that these old cities must needs be seen in the sunshine by those who feel what gay lives they had once led; by dimmer light they are very sullen spectres, and their doom still seems to brood upon them. I know that even Pompeii could not have been joyous that sunless afternoon, for what there was to be seen of mournful Herculaneum was as brilliant with colors as anything in the former city. Nay, I believe that the tints of the frescoes and painted columns were even brighter, and the walls of the houses were far less ruinous than those of Pompeii. But no house was wholly freed from lava, and the little street ran at the rear of the buidings which were supposed to front on some grander avenue not yet exhumed. It led down, as the custodian pretended, to a wharf, and he showed an iron ring in the wall of the house of Argo, standing at the end of the street, to which, he said, his former fellow-citizens used to fasten their boats, though it was all dry enough there now.

There is evidence in Herculaneum of much more ambitious domestic architecture than seems to have been known in Pompeii. The ground-plan of the houses in the two cities is alike; but in the former there was often a second story, as was proven by the charred ends of beams still protruding from the walls, while in the latter there is only one house which is thought to have aspired to a second floor. The house of Argo is also much larger than any in Pompeii, and its appointments were much more magnificent. Indeed, we imagined that in this more purely Greek town we felt an atmosphere of better taste in everything than prevailed in the fashionable Roman watering-place, and though this, too, was a summer resort of the "best society of the empire." The mosaic pavements were exquisite, and the little bedchambers dainty and delicious in their decorations. The lavish delight in color found expression in the vividest reds upon the walls, and not only were the columns of the garden painted, but the foliage of the capitals was tinted of various hues. The garden of Argo's house was vaster than any of the classic world which we had seen, and was superb with a long colonnade of unbroken columns. Between these and the walls of the houses was a pretty pathway of mosaic, and in the midst once stood marble tables, under which the workmen exhuming the city found certain crouching skeletons. At one end was the dining-room, of course, and painted on the wall was a lady with a parasol. I thought all Herculaneum sad enough, but the profusion of flowers growing wild in this garden gave it a yet more tender and pathetic charm. Here—where so long ago the flowers had bloomed, and perished in the terrible blossoming of the mountain that sent up its fires in the awful similitude of nature's harmless and lovely forms, and showered its destroying petals all abroad—was it not tragic to find again the soft tints, the graceful shapes, the sweet perfumes of the earth's immortal life? And of them that planted and tended and plucked and bore in their bosoms and twined in their hair these fragile children of the summer, what witness in the world? Only the crouching skeletons under the tables. Alas and alas! Master Poet, lend us your rhymes and your handkerchief.

V.

THE skeletons went with us throughout Herculaneum, and descended into the cell, all green with damp, under the basilica, and lay down, fettered and manacled, beside the big bronze kettle there in which the prisoners used to cook their dinners. How ghastly the jolly thought of it was? If we had really seen this kettle and the skeletons there—as we did not—we could not have suffered more. They took all the life out of the house of Perseus, and the beauty from his pretty little domestic temple to the Penates, and this was all there was left in Herculaneum to see.

"Is there nothing else?" we demand of the custodian.

"Signori, this is all."

"It is mighty little."

"Perdoni, signori—ma!"

"Well," we say sourly to each other, glancing round at the walls of the pit, on the bottom of which the bit of city stands, "it is a good thing to know that Herculaneum amounts to nothing."

IN THE MONT CENIS TUNNEL.

ARRIVED at the entrance, I delivered my letter to Signore Genesio, the director of the workmen, who invited me into his bureau, where he called my attention to a caoutchouc coat reaching nearly to the heels, and which he recommended me to put on. We then went to the mouth of the tunnel, where, each receiving from the custodian a lighted lamp, attached to a wire about eighteen inches in length, we commenced our journey into "the bowels of the earth."

The entrance does not materially differ in appearance from that of ordinary railway tunnels. It is here built up and faced with solid masonry, and is twenty-five feet three and a half inches wide at the base, twenty-six feet two and three quarters inches at the broadest part, and twenty-four feet seven inches high. A double railway track emerges from the mouth, and wagons loaded with debris were coming out; and others, filled with cut stones for the masonwork, drills, and other working utensils, going in. As we entered, the only light we could see ahead was a gas jet blazing in the distance.

Along either side of the tunnel there is a trottoir of flagstones, upon which we walked, lighting a path for our feet with the lamp which hung near them. The air-conduit is ranged along the side of the gallery, while in the middle of the tunnel, between the two lines of rails, a canal has been dug, through which gas and water pipes are conveyed to the end of the gallery. This canal is wide and deep enough to afford a refuge for the workmen and a means of exit in case the tunnel should be filled by a fall of the crumbling rock above. The masonry on either side was damp, and in many places little streams came trickling through it, and it occurred to me that in time this constant percolation must inevitably wear away the cement which binds the blocks of stone together, and undermine the vault. Overhead the masonry is not visible, nothing being seen but a wooden partition, dividing the tunnel into two equal galleries above and below. The object of this, which is only temporary, is to create a current, the rarefied air from the lower gallery rising and rushing out through the upper, while fresh air comes into the lower one to supply its place. As yet this partition extends only a short distance, and is not of much practical value.

We passed the gas jet, and, looking before us, saw nothing but the most impenetrable darkness; and looking behind, I observed the entrance gradually growing smaller, until, after I had continually turned and watched it till it had dwindled down to the apparent size of an apple, it suddenly dropped out of sight, as the sun sinks below the horizon in a calm summer sea. Peering then in either direction, I saw only impenetrable darkness. I use the word "saw" advisedly, for this darkness here in the bowels of the earth seemed to be palpable and ponderable—something more than what the philosophers define as a mere absence of light—something heavier and more solid than a negative—a real positive entity, which it seemed to me I could feel pressing against and around me, as, guided by the flaring flame of our lamps, we forced our way through it. Upon inquiring of my guide how far we had reached, he called my attention to a little notch in the wall, where the distance was marked 1,000 metres, or about two-thirds of a mile.

A dull rumbling sound attracted my attention; and in the distance, and seeming miles away, lights were dancing up and down in the murky air, as the feu follet, or wildfire, dances and flits in summer evenings over marshes, bogs, and fens. These were the lamps carried by some workmen going out, and a wagon loaded with débris soon came rolling by us. Up to this time I had experienced no particular difficulty in breathing—a sensation only that the air was unnatural and dank, like that in a cellar. As we advanced, however, it began to grow hot and stifling, and we entered a thick yellow fog, redolent of the fumes of gunpowder—which, indeed, it was, seeking its way towards the mouth of the tunnel. This was very disagreeable, almost suffocating, producing a sensation of heaviness upon the brain, a dull headache, and a fearful feeling of dread. As we walked on we saw lights again, dancing like fireflies in the distance, and soon a party of rough, half-naked, smoke-begrimed men, who loomed up in the fog like enormous giants as they approached, passed us on their way from work.

At a distance of 1,670 yards, or nearly a mile from the entrance, we came upon a little cabin, or barrack, built upon one side, and here my guide informed me that the completed portion of the tunnel ended. Entering the cabin, and following his advice and example, I gladly removed coat and vest, covering myself again with the caoutchouc; and, picking and trimming our lamps, we darted again into the darkness. Up to this time it had been plain sailing, walking along with as little difficulty or obstacle as on a sidewalk in a deserted street. Upon quitting this, however, we entered the gallery in corso di scavazione, that portion of the tunnel which, having been opened by the perforating machines, was now being enlarged by the ordinary hand process. Here there was no longer any trottoir, and, picking our way over piles of rocks which looked as though they had been thrown in confusion by giants at play, dodging wagons passing in and out, passing groups of swarthy workmen, through an atmosphere yellow, thick, and stifling, we at length came upon a group of men standing quietly as if awaiting something, in front of a heavy oaken door, which closed the passage in advance of us. My guide said we must stop here for the present. I imagined the cause, and selecting the softest, smoothest-looking rock, sat down and meditated.

Here was I, more than a mile from the mouth of the tunnel, with a mile of Alps piled above my head. The gallery was not more than ten feet wide and seven high, and its roof and sides were of jagged, sharp, protruding rocks, seeming to need but a slight shaking to send them tumbling down about our ears. Suppose they should tumble, and we be all buried alive in this hole in the earth! Suppose some of the predicted rivers or possible lakes should find their way through some aperture just opened, and engulf us now! Suppose the air-pipe should burst, or, worse still, the supply of air be stopped, and we all suffocated! Suppose ——, but the rapidly-crowding hypotheses was broken by a sudden sound which might well, under all the circumstances, have appalled a braver and more firmly constituted man, and which for an instant made me believe that one of my suppositions was about to become a reality. Bang!—but not the sharp, cracking "bang" of a heated cannon, or the sound of a rock-blast in the open air—a dead, dull, rumbling explosion, which reverberated through the gallery, and seemed to give the whole earth a shake. I started, and involuntarily looked up, as if expecting to see the stony roof give way and tumble. Bang! bang! bang! in rapid succession five or six other blasts were blown; the oaken doors were opened, a huge gust of thick yellow smoke and stifling black gunpowder came rushing toward us, when my guide touched me on the shoulder and said we could now proceed. I uttered an inward "thank God!" that I was really safe, and speedily sprang up and joined him.

Passing beyond the heavy oaken doors, still carefully picking our way over the stones through the gallery, growing lower and narrower at every step, through the smoke we soon discovered a brilliant blaze of gas, and heard a sharp hissing sound. Suddenly we emerged from the heat and smoke, and were breathing an air fresh, sweet, exhilarating, and doubly grateful to the lungs after the deteriorated material upon which they had been feeding. We were in the "advanced gallery" at the end of the tunnel, and before us was the affusto, bearing its nine perforators, persistently striking and boring their way into the solid rock, scattering around them sparks of fire struck off at every blow.

The gallery here is not quite nine feet in width, and but eight and a-half in height. The affusto, as the huge structure is called upon which the perforating machines are borne, and which bears precisely the same relation to them that the carriage does to the gun, nearly fills up the entire space. In order to observe the action of the machinery, we were obliged to coast carefully along the side of this heavy wagon, and when arrived at the front, to wedge ourselves between it and the rock, with just space enough to stand in.

Here the sights and sounds really became cheerful and pleasant. The gallery is brilliantly lighted; the compressed air, a jet of which is constantly escaping from the conduit pipe, is fresh, cool, and grateful to the wearied lungs; the constant rapid "thud" of the drill as it strikes the rock; the hissing sound of the escaping air; the cries of the workmen to each other, sounding unnaturally loud in this pure air and confined space, all constituted a scene as exciting as it was strange. A feeling of manly pride, at the sight and action of these wonderful machines, in the operation of which the powers of nature are made the slaves of man, seems to invade the soul. We forget that we are more than a mile from daylight, and that four thousand feet of Alps are weighing above our heads. We forget danger and banish fear; and the workmen, thirty-nine of whom are employed upon each affusto, seem to have no idea of either. They perform their labor in this little hole, with a remarkable sense of security. They seem to play with those huge machines; they put their hands upon and direct the steel bar which strikes the rock, and the powerful instrument which pierces the Alps glides between their fingers like a child's toy. They hop about like toads between the drills, perch themselves upon and under the various parts of the monster machine, and never seem to dream that at any moment, some unknown, unlooked-for fissure in the rock may be discovered, and they crushed to atoms by the tumbling mass; or that this powerful agent, which they have made their slave, with its explosive force of six atmospheres, may some time burst its iron fetters, and scatter death and destruction around it.

Each perforator, nine of which are at work, is entirely independent of every other, so that, when one is placed hors de combat, its inability to act does not affect the rest. It is much easier to describe the operation of the perforator and its effect than the complicated machinery by which it is set in motion. The motive power is conveyed to it from the conduit by a flexible pipe, which throws the compressed air into a cylinder placed horizontally along the affusto. In this cylinder a piston works back and forth, and to this piston is attached a fleuret, or drill, about three feet long, finely tempered and sharpened at the end. As the piston moves up and down, it of course drives the drill against the rock, and interdraws it, and by a very delicate and complicated piece of machinery a rotary motion, similar to that in hand-labor, is given to the drill itself. We arrived in the "advanced gallery" at a very favorable moment, just as a new attack was about being commenced by a perforator.

A drill was attached by a flexible joint to the piston-rod; a workman standing upon the front end of the machine held and directed this, as a gardener would the hose of a common garden-engine; the compressed air was turned on by another workman, at the hind end of the affusto, and the drill commenced its rapid and heavy blows upon its formidable foe. "Thud!" "thud!" "thud!" it goes, at the rate of two hundred times a minute. Two men mind this portion of the apparatus, one to give the general direction of the drill, and the other, standing upon the ground, holds the end where it strikes the rock with a crooked iron, to prevent it from flying off from the desired point of attack. The force of each stroke of the bar is 90 kilogrammes, or 198 English pounds, and as the piston moves back and forth, and consequently causes the bar to strike the rock at the rate of from 180 to 200 times a minute, each drill, therefore, exercises upon the point of attack a force equivalent to 39,600 pounds a minute.

The rock upon which the perforators were at work when we entered was hard white quartz, the most difficult to pierce which has yet been encountered. This layer was struck in the middle of June last, and its presence has materially retarded the progress of the tunnel. Formerly, in the mica, hornblende, slate, and limestone, through which they quarried, the perforators made an advance of from one and a half to three yards a day. In this quartz they now make but from eighteen to thirty inches. A few figures will exhibit the rapid and decided reduction in the rate of progress. In May last, the advance was 91 metres; in June, when the first croppings of the quartz began to appear, it was reduced to 49½; in July, to 16; in August, to 13; and in September, to 19½ metres. It is supposed that there still remains a year's work in this quartz.

In commencing a perforation, the first difficulty is, making a hole sufficiently large to confine the drill. When this first strikes the rock it hits wide and wild, like a pugilist blinded by the blows of his adversary. When once fairly entered, however, it works back and forth, and rotates with great precision and regularity, a stream of water being conveyed into the hole by a flexible pipe to facilitate the boring. The nine perforators are placed above, below, in the centre, and on the sides of the affusto, so as to attack the rock at different points and angles, upon a surface of seven square metres. About eighty holes in the ordinary rock, from thirty to forty inches in depth, and varying in diameter from an inch and a half to three inches, are thus bored in preparation for blasting. In the quartz, however, in which the boring is now in progress, the holes are made but from seven inches to a foot in depth. Eight hours is usually employed in the boring, and this being completed, the affusto is drawn back, and a new set of workmen, the miners, take possession of the gallery. The holes are charged with powder and tamped, the miners retire behind the oaken doors, the slow match is ignited, an explosion occurs, which sends its reverberating echoes to the very extremity of the tunnel; the rock blown out is cleared away, the affusto is advanced again, and another set of workmen coming in, the perforators are set in motion.

And this continues year in and out, weekdays and Sundays, night and day. The thousand workmen employed upon either side are divided into three reliefs, each working eight hours and resting sixteen. But two days in the year, Easter Sunday and Christmas, are acknowledged holidays. And for this constant, difficult, and dangerous subterranean labor, accompanied with an oppressive heat and a poisonous atmosphere, with smoke and grime and dirt, the common laborers receive but three francs a day, the more important and experienced ones four and five.

The quartz rock is terribly destructive to the drills and machines, and the former are required to be changed every few minutes, the tempered ends being battered and dulled after a few hundred strokes against the rock. In the comparatively soft material through which they have been passing there has been an average of a hundred and fifty drills and two perforators placed hors de combat for each metre of advance; and M. Sommellier estimates the number of perforating machines which will succumb in the attack, before the final victory is gained, at no less than two thousand.

My guide and myself had now been wedged in between the affusto and the rock for more than half an hour, and having seen and heard sufficiently, I proposed to leave; and taking our lamps, we commenced our "progress" backward. On our passage through the gallery of excavation we were frequently stopped by wagons standing on the rail track, which were receiving loads of stone, let fall into them through traps cut in the partition previously mentioned, and which divides the tunnel into two galleries. I had a curiosity to mount into this upper gallery; and climbing a steep staircase cut in the rock, we soon entered it. Here was another strange sight: an immense stone chamber, with walls and roof of jagged stone, through which little streams of water were percolating, filled with smoke, through which the flickering light of the miners' lamps was dulled and deadened, a hot, fœtid atmosphere, and a hundred black-looking men boring and drilling on every side, the platform covered with loose stones, the débris of the blast which we had heard on entering, and from the effects of which we were only protected by this oaken wall. "Are not accidents frequent here?" I asked my guide. "Not very," he replied; and told me that since the beginning of the work but about forty men had been killed by premature explosions, falling of the rock, by being crushed under the wagons, and every other form of accident. The day after I visited the tunnel, upon the very spot where I stood in the "advanced gallery," a premature explosion occurred, caused by a spark struck from the rock while a miner was tamping a charge, resulting in the death of four men and the blinding and serious maiming of six others.

Over and among the stones, and down another steep ladder, and a short walk brought us to the little cabin where we had left our coats. These we were glad to put on again, as the air was already growing colder. In the gallery of excavation the thermometer, summer and winter, ranges from 71 degrees to 84 degrees Fahr., and there is frequently a difference of 40 degrees in the temperature of the interior and exterior of the tunnel. Over the trottoir we rapidly retraced our steps towards the entrance. This soon appeared in sight, and growing larger and larger, we soon reached it, and emerged once more safe and sound into God's fresh pure air, and saw before us and around us again the snow-crowned, fir-girdled Alps towering above the valley of the Arc.

We had been nearly two hours "in the bowels of the earth," and the place where we had stood by the side of the affusto was 2,170 metres, or 2,372 yards—nearly a mile and a half—from the entrance. Up to the end of September last the advance made upon the Italian side was 2,914 metres and 20 centimetres; that upon the French, 2,154 metres and 80 centimetres. After passing through the quartz in which they are now engaged the engineers expect to strike a layer of gypsum, through which the perforators will make an advance of three metres a day. On the first of January, 1866, the tunnel on the Bardoneche side had reached a length of 3,110 metres, on the French, 2,200, making in all 5,310 metres, leaving 6,910 metres, or 7,228 yards, yet to be completed. This the geologists and engineers confidently predict, unless some unforeseen obstacle occurs, can be done in four years, and that the tunnel will be opened from end to end by the first of January, 1870.

Yet there are not a few old croakers, who still believe that the "unforeseen obstacles" will yet be encountered, and bar the way of the perforator and affusto; that harder rock may yet be struck; that the subterranean caverns and yawning chasms and abysses may stretch beneath the very summit of the Grand Vallon; that the rivers and lakes may yet burst forth and overwhelm and engulf workmen, and the valleys in which its either end debouches. In reply to all this, however, the geologists and engineers calmly assert, that thus far their "diagnosis," if I may use the term, of the character of the mountain chain, beneath which the tunnel runs, has proved correct, and that they have no reason to believe it will not continue so to the end.

Let us hope that they are right, and the croakers all wrong, and that within the time predicted, on some fine morning, the miners upon either side may hear the steady, rapid "thud" of the drill, as it strikes upon the then only thin wall, upon the other; and that the affusto having been withdrawn, and the mine fired, when the smoke of the explosion shall have cleared away, the laborers from Fourneaux and Bardoneche, climbing over the débris, may meet and shake their rough hands together, and mingle their rude voices in a shout of joy, that their work is finished, and that there are no more Alps.

Rocky Mountain Giants.—An extraordinary statement has appeared in print, in reference to a race of old giants, in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains. It appears that on Meagher's Bar, opposite Nevada, there have recently been discovered fossils which show that this part of the world was once peopled by a race of men ten and twelve feet high. They were embedded about eight feet, in what might be termed a close diluvial deposit, and in what the configuration of the country indicates was once the eddy of a river. A jawbone dug up is double the size of an ordinary human jawbone, the width being fully five inches. It is in a perfect state of preservation; so perfect that, had it been of ordinary size, one would have supposed that its owner had not made his (or her) exit from this vale of tears more than fifteen or twenty years ago. The enamel of the teeth still remains bright and uninjured by the action of fire, water, or air. Not a tooth is lost. The discoverer considers, from a measurement of ribs and other bones, that the possessor must have been at least twelve feet high. The Montana Post gives currency to these and other particulars of this wonderful discovery.

SEEDTIME.

GRIEF is a rain, to fall
Upon us, one and all,
Like needful showers that make the dry earth mellow:
For Autumn days will come—
The root of love is numb,
Its sweetest blossoms all are sear and yellow.

And then a quick regret
Will harshly seem to whet
The ploughshare of misfortune, while it burrows
Along its cruel way;
And glossy locks grow gray
And lustreless beside the new-turned furrows.

Old Time comes on amain—
A farmer with his grain—
Experience he sifts between his fingers
As up and down he goes.
Search, Time, along the rows:
Lost in thy path a weed of evil lingers!

His cunning skill is such
He seeks with careful touch
The seeded grooves with softest soil to cover:
Yet, Time, thou hath not art,
But in some bruised heart
Long traces of thy husbandry will hover!

Oh, busy husbandman,
How perfect is thy plan!
Behold the harvest! for thy careful flinging
Of little curious seed
Shall spring a crop indeed:
Lo! peace and trust and every virtue springing.

CURIOUS KINGS.

HISTORY is a sort of curiosity-shop, in which kings are the objects that fetch the highest price. Many, no doubt, are models of wisdom and goodness, but unfortunately they are often distinguished from their subjects in being of all men the most unfit to govern, and in setting the worst possible example. It has long been matter of dispute whether their right comes from above or from below, from the people or from the skies; but however this point may be settled, they have always a certain anointing on their brows, and must be reverenced accordingly. They wear a crown and wield a sceptre: that is enough. They used to touch for the leprosy and king's evil, but their virtue in this respect has fallen into disrepute. There is scarcely one amongst them that has not something remarkable about him. Let us look round the curiosity-shop just alluded to, and see of what stuff some of the queerest of them are made.

The part of the museum devoted to Oriental curiosities is full of strange kings, in garments gorgeously dyed and blazing with costly gems. Take one as a sample—the Sultan Machamuth, who dwelt in the city of Combeia, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and ate poison every day. Ludovico di Varthema describes him as having moustaches so long that he tied them over his head, and a white beard reaching to his girdle. Fifty elephants passed their lives in doing him homage, making obeisances when he rose from bed and when he sat at meat. In eating his poison, he took care not to swallow too much. This exemplary sultan had three or four thousand wives, who died off one by one with fearful rapidity; for, according to Barbosa, another Italian traveller, his person and even his clothes were so impregnated with poison, that "if a fly lighted on his hand, it swelled and died incontinently." Such are the accounts given of this second Mithridates in a work lately reprinted by the Hakluyt Society.

In the same century with Machamuth, the greatest potentate of Europe voluntarily vacated a throne which thousands would have risked their lives to obtain.

This was the Emperor Charles V. Germany, Spain, Naples, the Netherlands, and the newly-discovered tracts of the Far West, had submitted to his sway during forty years; but he was world-weary, and sighed for the quiet of some sylvan shade. Dividing his empire, therefore, between his brother and his son, he retired to St. Yuste, in Estremadura; and there, amid groves of lemon and myrtle, and waters gushing from the rocky hillsides, passed the remainder of his days more peacefully and pleasantly than when he commanded the finest army in the world, and galleys and merchant ships, richly freighted, hoisted his colors on every sea, from the coast of Flanders to the Indian Ocean, and from the palmy shores of Tunis and Oran to the golden havens of Mexico and Peru.

But Charles V.'s abdication was less curious than that of Charles Emmanuel IV., King of Sardinia, who resigned all the French Republic had left him to his brother, Victor Emmanuel I., in 1802, and became literally a doorkeeper in the Gesu at Rome, where the cell which he occupied is still shown to visitors.

Our own century, indeed, has been as plentiful as any other in curious kings. The elder Disraeli has given a list of monarchs, dethroned at different periods, who wandered poor and afflicted over the face of the earth; but how would this catalogue have been lengthened if the author had lived at the present time! King making and unmaking has been the order of the day, and Fortune's wild wheel has caused many a ludicrous rise and fall.

We have seen one who was a poor usher in a school at Reichenau, afterwards sit eighteen years on the throne of France; and another who for some time worked as a tallow-chandler at New York, become conqueror and dictator of the Two Sicilies. Look at Mr. Gregor MacGregor. This canny Scotchman, who had travelled a good deal in Central America, thought it would be a fine thing to found an empire. He therefore proclaimed himself Cacique of the Poyais, on the Mosquito coast, raised a band of two or three hundred volunteers in England, and sent them as his subjects and soldiers to the Black River. He appointed Baron Tinto, alias Mr. Hector Hall, lieutenant-governor of his capital, "brigadier-general, and commander of the 4th regiment of the line." He created sundry "Counts of Rio-Negro," together with ministers, admirals, and officers of every grade. Just as this nucleus of a gigantic power is brought to perfection, in strides a pestilential fever, and carries off all his Highness's European subjects. In August, 1823, a hundred fresh recruits arrive from England; but the sovereign keeps prudently out of the way, and from the other side of the Atlantic contemplates in perfect security the failure of his schemes and the misery of those he has duped. Here was an adventurer who became a king by his own scheming; let us now make a note of the scheming of others.

In 1786 Great Britain was obliged to abandon several colonies in Central America, and was anxious a few years ago to retain its hold on that territory. Colonel Fancourt, the British governor of Belize, in the Gulf of Honduras, laid hands on a barbarous Cacique, and haled him to Government House. While fully expecting to be bastinadoed, the chief was told that he was forthwith to be proclaimed king! A proclamation was jabbered to the natives, and a throne prepared in the Governor's drawing-room with the help of a sugar-hogshead. There sat the king of the Mosquitos, arrayed in a new pair of trousers and a clean shirt. An act of investure was read, and a crown of gilt paper was placed on his swarthy brows. The merchants of Belize were present at the coronation, and the new king, having received the largess of a few reals, caroused with his subjects till past midnight, and was found the next morning dead drunk on the floor. His name, however, was enrolled among the lords of mankind, and "the kingdom of the Mosquitos" was duly established under the protectorate of Great Britain!

There is something very curious in a king of the Sandwich Islands writing a preface to the Book of Common Prayer. Yet the late King Hawaii actually did this, and it is now published and sold as a tract by the Christian Knowledge Society.

There is nothing more uncommon than a throne divided by mutual consent. The Emperors of the East and West had distinct spheres of government, and their thrones were separated by wide continents and seas. But Siam is, at this moment, under a divided monarchy, two-thirds of the royal power being wielded by the first, and one-third by the second king. Each of these is a man of cultivated mind. Even the second speaks pure English, has a library filled with European books, and workshops for making scientific and mechanical instruments. But he is somewhat eclipsed by his brother, who, while a usurper held the throne, assumed the character of a Buddhist priest, and devoted his time to study. He has mastered Sanscrit and Pali, writes his autobiography in Latin, and speaks English with the precision of a scholar. Faithful to the traditions of the East, he has three hundred wives, and considers this a moderate allowance, seeing that his father had seven hundred. He laughed heartily when the British envoy, Sir John Bowring, told him that in England men are contented with one. It is curious to see him seated on his throne, with "all the wealth of Ormus and of Ind" sparkling in his crown and on his vestments, while the nobles of the land, in garments of gold, lie on all fours, with their faces nearly touching the ground, prostrate before his raised sceptre. But it is more curious still to follow him into one of his private apartments and there see him, as the envoy did, divested of every ornament, sitting with his youngest child, a girl of five years old, on his knee—her body painted the color of gold, and a chaplet of fragrant white flowers round her head.

The fact is, that in one particular kings differ from the rest of mankind. Being more loosened than others from restraint, and less exposed to the influence of public opinion, their individuality develops fast. The sharp outlines of their character, moral and intellectual, are less worn down than those of their subjects. Their will is generally their law; and hence, no less than from their exalted position, they become, for good or ill, the most picturesque, or, as the case may be, grotesque curiosities which history offers to our view.

A LESSON IN GERMAN.

TRAVELLERS of taste, who while en route let nothing in the domain of the beautiful escape their observatiou, and cast upon everything graceful or in any way charming a long look that to-morrow turns into a sweet memory, will not fail to remember a young, lovely and dashing waltzer, who, in the season of 1859, at Ems, always opened the ball, and never finding the waltz long enough, compelled the musicians to give a four-page supplement to the scores of Strauss or Musard.

The shrewdest judges of age, at eight o'clock in the morning called her four-and-twenty; at noon, twenty, and in the evening seventeen. A middle-aged gentleman accompanied her everywhere. Close observers said—some, he was her uncle, some her father, others, her husband. Everybody was wrong, as usual.

At the close of the day the mysterious pair used to cross the Lahn on the boat with which the terrestrial Charon waited for passengers at the end of the beautiful promenade. Once on the other bank of the Elysian copse, the young lady would sit under the trees and gloat over the lovely landscape that the sun tinted with his sweetest hues, while her companion, up since five A. M., would pay something on account to that most inexorable, but gentlest of creditors, which we call sleep.

It is always pleasant to give a name to pretty women whose proper appellations you don't know—it is a watering-place usage; and this young unknown had been, by common consent, distinguished as the Waking Beauty of the Wood, and her companion as the Ugly Sleeper of the Wood. One of Perrault's tales was needed for this mystery. But the history came.

One of the rich idlers who go from France to Ems to see people drink the waters, and to forget Paris for a month, came to the blooming meadows that the Lahn washes; and finding that the Seine, in spite of its bridges, did not furnish so much freshness and health as the pretty German naiad, took a two months' ticket to this hygienic theatre, that has green-clad mountains for side-scenes, the sun for a ceiling, flowers for audience, quiet instead of bustle, pure air instead of the smell of gas, and health for the term of subscription.

As the young man had a name like other people, we will not give him another; but for the purposes of this history let us call him Gaetan instead of Arthur, which is hackneyed.

In Paris, Gaetan used to dine at one of the cafés on the Boulevards, which was undeniably charming in winter, but in the two months of summer exhaled a kitchen odor not at all refreshing to the sense of smell, or to the palate. There he used to go and look out upon the lines of omnibuses and fiacres, the sun setting in a veil of gray dust-clouds, and the eaters sitting at the round tables and executing in chorus the everlasting refrain:

"Ah! how hot it is!"

At Ems the fashion of after-dinner life suited him better. He paced the elegantly rustic path that runs along the river, even to the farthest lawns of the Hotel de Quatre Tours; or, by way of variety, chartered a gondola for a florin, appointed himself captain for the little voyage, and awoke with his oars the sleeping Lahn, that would like so well to stop at Ems and not go on to lose itself in the Rhine, that gulps it down like a glass of water.

One evening the young Frenchman happened to cross the river at the same time with the ferry-boat, and was struck by the beauty of a lady passenger, who gazed lovingly on the green summit of the setting sun. It was the Waking Beauty of the Woods, on the way to her favorite grass-plot.

The sound of dipping oars roused the young lady; she turned her eyes toward the gondola, and two sets of glances met and made two hearts beat. Between two beings destined for each other there are often certain mysterious effluxions, sudden revelations of the future, that pass into the atmosphere when they first meet. These supernatural influences that descend from the eye to the heart have a still livelier force in the midst of delightful rural scenery in the soft light of a summer evening.

In the lovely valley of the Lahn there is an echo with a peculiar voice; they used to say that in its quality of German echo it adored music, because it returned with an added, inexpressible charm the far melody of the orchestra at the Kursaal.

This sweet echo prolongs the dance-call even to the Rhine, in thirty seconds, as if to humiliate the railroad, flinging it from peak to peak. Gaetan heard it, and making bird's-wings of his oars sped up the river like an arrow.

Why has not Germany raised a statue to the inventor of the waltz? If he had been born at Athens in Pericles' time, his admiring fellow-citizens would have made him a demi-god and given him Love for a nephew. What an immense service that inventor has rendered to those who came after him!

How many marriages he has brought about with his measures à trois temps. A swain hasn't the acquaintance of the lady he loves, and if the waltz were not, he might seek for ten years, perhaps, an opportunity of speaking to her; by the aid of the waltz he can address her and offer his hand, if he chooses, the very first evening.

So Gaetan, that very evening, engaged the unknown for the first waltz: she showed her gaslight age—seventeen. As to her toilet, she wore her hair in flat bandeau: a rose above her ear, a juvenile corsage, a girdle of floating azure and no jewelry.

To begin conversation in circumstances like these is more difficult than to solve a problem in trigonometry. Gaetan cudgelled his brains, but could think of nothing beyond some Parisian platitudes about the weather, the heat, the music, the Peace Congress, the voyage up the Rhine. But he must say something, so he ventured to remark:

"We are having a delightful summer this year."

This was stupid enough, but it required an answer, and after that they might go on, step by step, to higher topics.

The young valseuse made no reply: a shade of sadness overcast her face.

She thinks me vulgar, reflected Gaetan; but me try something better.

"It is strange," said he, "that the waltz was invented by a grave German, and the slow minuet by a frivolous Frenchman."

Silence would have been rudeness; and the young lady answered, in German, "I do not understand French, and I do not speak it."

This was Hebrew to Gaetan. Almost all German ladies speak French, he said to himself: it must be fatality that she doesn't.

The orchestra flung its last notes along the porphyry colonnade, and Gaetan, leading his partner to a seat, left her, with a silent obeisance.

The columns of the Kursaal at Ems favor the total seclusion of lovers who wish to see without being seen. Gaetan hid behind one to observe the appearance and attitude of his late partner, and judge if he might venture upon favorable conjectures; for with his share of that silliness common to so many of us, he believed he had made an impression.

If, after leaving her partner, a young lady talks with her neighbors, laughs without provocation, assumes the most graceful poses, refines naturally on the innocent art of coquetry; if, in fine, no symptom of distraction is visible in her face, it is because she is thinking of the dance, and that he who danced with her is already forgotten. But the fair unknown did not exhibit herself in this discouraging aspect to the keen eyes of the concealed observer.

The grave personage who always accompanied her made some remark, but the lady did not seem inclined to conversation; she answered by a motion of the head, or by monosyllables, as if she said: "We will talk of this to-morrow; don't disturb my meditations now." And shutting her fan she leaned her smooth chin upon it, and seemed to muse: the loveliest women and the most elegant toilets swept by her, but she did not vouchsafe them a glance.

At ten o'clock the father, husband, uncle, whatever he was, looked at his watch and rose hurriedly, like a man who feared to miss the exact minute for taking his glasses of water to-morrow. The lady made a slight movement of remonstrance, and cast a sweeping glance around the salon as she took the offered arm.

Gaetan interpreted all this to his own advantage, and gliding from column to column, like a debtor striving to avoid his creditor, he followed at a distance, resolved to discover the earthly residence of the wood-fairy. She takes the road to the Hotel de Telegraphe; but Gaetan never loses sight, in the gloom of the overhanging trees, of that white and flowing dress that lights up the darkness.

Having found out where she lives, Gaetan formed a dozen plans that proved impracticable, though he had thought them admirable; so he decided to wait for a better one, such as fortune sometimes takes the trouble of inventing for us when she wishes to be kind.

First, he must learn German in forty-eight hours, for day after to-morrow's ball; or at least he must learn the few phrases which make up the vocabulary of love. In a case like this the dictionary is only a huge book crammed with useless and stupid phrases: when one is in love he can spend a lifetime in saying only four. King Solomon, who knew whereof he spoke, has expressed this sage opinion: he has written, that outside of the language of love there are only formulas of vanity. One has a pretty strong case if Solomon is on his side—he who had three hundred love affairs in his life, according to the gravest historians.

M. Kirchberger, librarian at Ems, came to Gaetan's assistance—a man of spirit and intelligence, and who spoke French like a native who knows how to speak it. He gave the eager student a little volume of familiar dialogues in French and German, with rules for pronouncing.

During the two days consecrated to the work of learning the ten German phrases that alone were necessary to his happiness he used to take a little rest from study, and walk under the farther trees of the avenue, watching the beloved one's windows. This is a work that young men always have done and always will do, even to the uttermost windows of Jehosaphat. They hum softly, "O Matilda, idol of my soul!" or "Come, gentle lady!" or "When one awaits his love," or "With kindness view my pain:" one has a fine choice, for there is great variety in the operas.

If the window remains deaf to all the gamuts of Meyerbeer, Rossini, and Boieldieu, the tenor has his labor for his pains: he can dismiss himself or seek another engagement to try a better fortune. But if the window curtain is rustled with intelligent caution, if that wooden ear is opened; if a ringlet of blonde or brown floats out on the wind; if a charming profile follows and outlines itself in the shadow or the sun—ah! then the lover sees shine out from that enviable window the rainbow of hope; the tenor is engaged, even if he sings falsely, for the falseness of his notes proves the sincerity of his passion.

The play of the window-blind exhibited every shade of gradation; it was like an ascending scale in music; the fastening creaked timidly; the double shutter opened gently; a ringlet floated out; the divine profile followed, and the adored face beamed out to the sun and extinguished it. Gaetan pressed his hand on his heart to keep it from bursting.

At his second visit the window played the same game.

Then Gaetan strove to make rapid progress in the German of love. "O Love! what a teacher of languages thou art!" he ejaculated as he went to Nassau to dine and to study his ten phrases in the enchanted valley where the mountains dress themselves in green velvet for the encouragement of lovers; and crossing the pretty bridge of Nassau, he dropped into the river the last of his phrases—words compendious as a folio—I love you—Ich liebe Sie, and in his intoxication he prayed the Lahn, swift messenger, to bear this poem to the woody bank where his love watched in the twilight.

II.

THE ball-hour came and Gaetan shook with fear, like the conscript when he hears the first roar of cannon in battle. Some minutes, first, he walked among the green plane-trees on the terrace, amusing himself with repeating his ten phrases: but lo! when the critical moment struck, he had forgotten them all. It was a solemn crisis. The gay throng swarmed into the Kursaal; the orchestra struck up; the young officers of Coblentz set about making their engagements: he must summon courage and secure her at all hazards for the first dance. The rest belonged to Fate. No opportunity remained for a glance at the little book; and besides he would have been laughed at if found taking a lesson in German, with his foot raised to go and talk to a German lady.

With his head in a fever he hurried to the Kursaal. In a few minutes the unknown came and took her accustomed seat, dressed as on the previous evening. Women put a meaning into the most trifling details. Gaetan understood her choice of place and toilet, and his smile of intelligent approval was not lost—two beautiful eyes with velvet irises caught it as it flew.

He approached her, bowed respectfully, and murmured some syllables which in all lands signify: I engage you for the first waltz or the first quadrille; his offer was accepted with an eagerness very slightly dissembled.

The orchestra let loose its hurricane of thundering sound, and the charming pair whirled over the marble with that graceful lightness that fascinates the gazer and keeps his eyes fixed till the very last strain. With the fair German's hand in his, Gaetan was more than ever oblivious of the German language; but by a violent effort of will he succeeded in recalling the last of Love's ten commandments—I love thee; and, to supply the lack of the nine others, he repeated this nine times, to the accompaniment of the maddening orchestra, which seemed to adapt its music to a passionate declaration.

"Behold a miracle of love!" said the young girl, "he has learned German in forty-eight hours!" And in the last measure of the waltz she deigned to answer him with a smile and a glance which signified everything but disapprobation. By the time the ball was ended the continual interchange of eloquent glances convinced Gaetan that he was on the road to a hasty marriage.

The next day he bought a grammar and a dictionary, French and German, and had them covered with satin paper and ornamented with green ribbons.

On the watch at seven o'clock, he saw the fair unknown and her companion go out, and at once made his way to their house. Nearly all the porters along the route speak French, he said to himself, and my plan will infallibly succeed. In fact, it did succeed, with the aid of five Frederics, which a porter never refuses.

Gaetan got all the information he wanted. The unknown gentleman was Dr. Blank, and the lady was widow Laerta, aged thirty years, as a stupid, but truth-telling passport testified. The figure "thirty" surprised Gaetan somewhat, but abated not a jot of his passion. It is the age of your true woman, he thought; from Dido and Cleopatra down, widows have always inspired the most ardent sentiments.

And he said to the porter: "Give these books to Mad. Laerta's maid, and let her place them on a table in her mistress's chamber."

The porter put his hand on his heart and ten Frederics in his pocket, in token of his unfaltering fidelity, and went up stairs to accomplish his important mission. At the breakfast hour, which comes after exercise and the drinking of the waters, Gaetan crouched in a clump of trees to study from a distance the language of the window, and to get, if possible, some news of his books. "I will bet a thousand francs," he said, "that she will come to the window with the French grammar in her hand?" Busy with plans for their marriage, and with his eyes fixed on the window, he heard a piercing cry, and saw a boy, who was driving a donkey along the street, knocked down by a book hurled from Laerta's window. Gaetan stood stupefied. Then, impelled by a foolish curiosity, he went forward and mingled with the crowd that gaped about the thunder-stricken little donkey-driver.

"Think of it!" said a French voice; "some people indulge in very cruel amusements. Here is a Nero in furnished lodgings who has just knocked down this poor child with a dictionary!"

A collection was taken up for the luckless urchin, and Gaetan gave him ten thalers. At the same moment a purse was thrown from Laerta's window that rang on the pavement with the sound of gold. The boy's fortune was made; he wept no more.

Gaetan resumed the attitude of stupefaction. If he could have opened his tenor's lips, he would have sung the everlasting chorus of Scribe's operas: "What, then, is this mystery! this mystery infernal, that freezes me with terror?" A student from Munich picked up the dictionary, and made off at great speed, rejoicing in a bargain that Fortune had sold him for nothing.

Joining the crowd, the faithful porter made every effort to attract Gaetan's attention; but the young man was gazing at the mountain-peak that rose above the line of houses, and seeking in the clouds a solution of his mystery. Then the porter ventured to approach and give him a sounding blow on the elbow, which produced the desired effect. The gaze of the unhappy lover descended from the clouds, and he became conscious of the intelligent pantomime of the porter, who seemed to say, "I have something very important to say to you." So they went aside a little, and Gaetan listened to the following revelation. This porter, you see, according to the usage of his profession, was accustomed to talk with all the lady's maids, in order to learn the great and little secrets of their families, and he had fathomed the mystery of Dr. Blank, the paternal uncle of the beautiful widow. It is a curious page of history:

In the days of the Emigration, the young Chevalier Marcel de —— came to Coblentz with the Baron, his father, to avoid the kind attentions of the Committee of Public Safety. Faithful to the teachings of comic opera, Marcel, desiring to be a favorite with the ladies wherever he happened to be, and to relieve the tedium of exile, resolved to make love to a young German girl, who spoke French admirably. The young lady conceived a violent passion for the handsome, powdered, bespangled and beribboned butterfly, who called her his shepherdess, and made love to her in ardent quatrains.

One fine day—a very sad day, however, for the young shepherdess of the banks of the Moselle—the Chevalier, alarmed by the word "marriage," which she pronounced too often, crossed the Rhine, and went to make new conquests, up the Lahn, from Nassau to Giessen. The unhappy, deserted Ariana had an attack of high fever, and in her delirium sung without ceasing:

> "O beautiful Iris, be faithful to me;
> I shall go to the realms above,
> Loving thee still, for the soul dies not,
> And my soul, you know, is my love!"

Her father, learning her secret from these ravings, took his sword and went in search of the exiled Baron.

When he found him, he said: "Sir, in 1757, I was twenty years old, and I fought under the great Frederick at Rossbach, against the Prince de Soubise. I can measure swords with you even now, for vengeance will strengthen my arm.

"By my soul!" replied the Baron, "your arrival is most timely. I am bored to death, and this affair will help me to get rid of an hour or two, as Racine says in Les Plaideurs. I know M. de Soubise well; he was a charming man; he had the honor of being beaten by the great Frederick—a privilege second to none other. Let me throw off my cloak, and I am with you."

The two champions walked to the banks of the Moselle, and, as they were about to begin, the Baron said, with a winning air:

"By the way, Monsieur, what are we to fight about?"

"How! Baron, you don't know?" said Ariana's father.

"Certainly not, M. de Rossbach."

The proper explanation was at once made, and as their swords crossed, the Baron ejaculated:

"I always knew that my devil of a son would be Richelieu II.;" and, after three passes, he fell, mortally wounded, saying, "Three masses for my soul at St. Castor, and a hundred pistoles to the curé."

After this event, when the young ladies of the family of the hero of Rossbach reached the age of fifteen, they were required to swear on the Holy Bible that they would never learn to speak French, and would never touch a French book. This was the oath of Hannibal among the females of the family, and Laerta, like her ancestresses, had taken it on a Guttenberg Bible.

Therefore, when Dr. Blank found a French dictionary in his house, he was seized with such a rage that he hurled it through the window—the huge book enriching a poor boy in its fall.

One clause had been omitted in this oath. It was this: "I swear I will never marry a Frenchman."

And on account of this omission, Laerta, near the close of the season, gave her hand to Gaetan, who knew well enough all the German phrases that are necessary to the happiness of a married pair. Afterwards he made great progress, and became so familiar with all the refinements of the language of Goethe, that Laerta had no need to speak that of Lamartine, and kept her oath.

REMARKABLE ESCAPES OF EMINENT MEN.

SOME years ago a young man holding a subordinate position in the East India Company's service twice attempted to deprive himself of life by snapping a loaded pistol at his head. Each time the pistol missed fire. A friend entering his room shortly afterward, he requested him to fire it out of the window, it then went off without any difficulty. Satisfied thus that the weapon had been duly primed and loaded, the young man sprang up, exclaiming: "I must be reserved for something great!" and from that moment gave up the idea of suicide, which for some time previous had been uppermost in his thoughts. That young man afterwards became Lord Clive.

Two brothers were on one occasion walking together, when a violent storm of thunder and lightning overtook them. One was struck dead on the spot, the other was spared; else would the name of the great reformer, Martin Luther, have been unknown to mankind.

The holy St. Augustine, having to preach at a distant town, took with him a guide, who, by some unaccountable means, mistook the usual road and fell into a by-path. He afterwards discovered that his enemies, having heard of his movements, had placed themselves in the proper road with a design of murdering him.

Baron, the sculptor, when a tender boy of five years old, fell into a pit of a soap boiler, and must have perished, had not a workman, just entering the yard, observed the top of his head, and immediately delivered him.

When Oliver Cromwell was an infant, a monkey snatched him from his cradle, leaped with him through a garret window, and ran along the leads of the house. The utmost alarm was excited among the inmates, and various were the devices used to rescue the child from the guardianship of the newly-found protector. All were unavailing; his would-be rescuers had lost courage, and were in despair of ever seeing the baby alive again, when the monkey quietly retraced its steps and deposited its burden safely on the bed. On a subsequent occasion the waters had well nigh quenched his insatiable ambition. He fell into a deep pond, from drowning in which, a clergyman named Johnson was the sole instrument of his rescue.

At the siege of Leicester, a young soldier, about seventeen years of age, was drawn out for sentry duty. One of his comrades was anxious to take his place. No objection was made, and this man went. He was shot dead while on guard. The young man first drawn became the author of the Pilgrim's Progress.

Doddrige, when born, was so weakly an infant, he was believed to be dead. A nurse standing by fancied she saw some signs of vitality. Thus the feeble spark of life was saved from being extinguished, and an eminent author and consistent Christian preserved to the world.

John Wesley, when a child, was only just preserved from fire. Almost the moment after he was rescued, the roof of the house where he had been fell in. Of Philip Henry a similar instance is recorded.

John Knox, the renowned Scotch reformer, was always wont to sit at the head of the table, with his back to the window. On one particular evening, without being able to account for it, he would neither himself sit in the chair nor permit any one else to occupy his place. That very night a bullet was shot in at the window, purposely to kill him; it grazed the chair in which he sat, and made a hole in the foot of a candlestick on the table.

Many years have now elapsed since three subalterns might have been seen struggling in the water off St. Helena; one of them, peculiarly helpless, was succumbing. He was saved to live as Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington.

The life of John Newton is but the history of a marvellous deliverance. As a youth he had agreed to accompany some friends on board a man-of-war. He arrived too late; the boat in which his friends had gone was capsized and all its occupants drowned. On another occasion, when the tide surveyor in the port of Liverpool, some business had detained him, so that he came to his boat much later than usual, to the great surprise of those who were in the habit of observing his then undeviating punctuality. He went out in the boat as heretofore to inspect a ship, which blew up before he reached her. Had he left the shore a few minutes sooner, he must have perished with the rest on board.

UNDER THE PERSIMMON.

As the oak flames on the lawn
I think of an Autumn gone,
An Indian Summer-time—the ripe October;
The forests were ablaze,
The blue sky all ahaze,
And only the fair fields turned brown and sober,

When cousin Madge and I—
Dear gipsy, sweet and sly,
Wandered across the fields—the fields of stubble;
The sun through red mists shone,
Looking as if 'twere blown
From a magician's pipe—a rosy bubble.

We sat beneath a tree,
"Oh, Harry dear," cried she,
"What is that fruit o'erhead so ripe and yellow?
Pray climb and pluck me some!"
I answered "'T is a plum
Of a most luscious flavor, sweet and mellow."

Then up the tree I sped,
And showered about her head
This sour false fruit—false fruit that looked delicious
She took one little bite—
Oh, the exquisite spite
That shook her dainty fist, so small—so vicious!

She shook that fist at me;
I cried, from up the tree,
"Sweetheart! sweetheart! I very well remember
The purple plums I ate—,
Purple and delicate,
From this same tree—and only last December.

"Could it have been the snow?
Oh dearest, don't frown so!
Was it the frost or snow that made them sweeter
As hearts in sharp distress
Lose half their bitterness,
Finding in woe a faith and hope completer.

I think I see her yet,
Her sweet mouth in a pet,
All puckered up with anger and persimmon;
I tried to moralize,
She scorned me with those eyes—
Those eyes that made her peerless among women.

Then down the stream I came,
Called coaxingly her name;
She stormed at first, then sobbed, and called me cruel
And mentioned a great guy
That loved her more than I—
At which I hinted mildly of a duel.

And then there comes a mist,
In which I think we kissed—
It seems quite real, yet very, very dreamy;
A dream of red wine floods,
Of spicy scarlet buds,
And tropic blossoms soft and bland and creamy:

Time gliding as a boat
On pearly ponds afloat—
A heaven of heavens—her tender love its portal
Oh beautiful strange dream,
How far its pictures seem,
For I am desolate, and she immortal.

All left to my despair
This flake of dusky hair,
And wild vine tendrils o'er a low grave groping;
Where, at her fast shut door,
Shut from me overmore,
Was ended all my dreaming—all my hoping.

EMILIE LAWSON.

CINDERELLA.—The origin of the tale from which this pantomime was adopted is sufficiently curious. It was about the year 1730 that a French actor of equal talent and wealth, named Thevenard, in passing through the streets of Paris observed upon a cobbler's stall the shoe of a female, which struck him by the remarkable smallness of its size. After admiring it for some time, he returned to his house; but his thoughts reverted to the shoe with such intensity that he reappeared at the stall the next day, but the cobbler could give him no other clue to the owner than that it had been left in his absence, for the purpose of being repaired. Day after day did Thevenard return to his post to watch the reintegration of his slipper, which proceeded slowly; nor did the proprietor appear to claim it. Although he had completed the sixtieth year of his age, so extravagant became his passion for the unknown fair one that he became (were it possible for a Frenchman of that day to be so) melancholy and miserable. His pain was, however, somewhat appeased by the avatar of the little foot itself, appertaining to a pretty and youthful girl in the very humblest class of life. All distinctions were levelled at once by love; the actor sought the parents of the female, procured their consent to the match, and actually made her his wife.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1866.

TUTHILL'S "CALIFORNIA."*

THE feeling of disappointment which most readers of Dr. Tuthill's History will experience, should not, and probably will not abate any of the reputation of the late lamented author. As a literary labor, begun amidst the harrassing cares and distractions of a journalist's life and crowned in the retiracy of ill health consequent upon those cares, it seems miraculously strong, nervous and sinewy. The disappointment will be owing rather to the reader's misconception of the subject treated: to the inherent vanity of most Californians, who expect that a complete and artistic history of California could be written to date; who imagine that a sketch of the civilization of the last twelve years ought to be as attractive as the real history of the two centuries upon which it is superposed, and who wonder that a geology which treats rather of the shifting and unformed sand and mould of the earth's surface, than the strata of the rocks below, is not as interesting or its record as legible. History has its natural epochs and divisions which no historian has the right to alter. The first volume of the history of California closed with the American conquest; we have not got beyond the first chapter of the second volume, and yet the greater part of Dr. Tuthill's book treats of the history of the State after the conquest—of matters that are fresh in the minds of the people; of details still accessible through newspaper files, in all the crudity and indigestibility which belongs to journalism and gossip.

We have too much faith in the capacity of the author to suppose that he was ignorant of these facts. He must have known that the lapse of years alone enables the historian to properly determine and settle the relations of men and events to history, and that posterity might reasonably reverse the judgments of to-day. The half-ironical tone of narration—the absence of didactic disquisition—the entire disregard of philosophical summary—all tend to prove that Dr. Tuthill was aware of the elementary defects of his subject. But he was shrewd enough to see that our smart, go-ahead civilization wished to anticipate history, even as they had anticipated everything else—that Californians desired a record of the deeds of contemporaneous men. The history of California after the American conquest was really what was wanted; but the Doctor was artist enough to know that a slight flavor of antiquity was required to give dignity to the work—as the parvenu knocks at the door of the Herald's College for arms and a genealogical tree. That is why we have a history written from a local, instead of a cosmical, view point; that is why we have events carefully detailed for the benefit of Californians, of which the world only takes notice in the abstract as results; that is why this history resembles the "Annals of San Francisco," rather than the pages of Bancroft or Macaulay; why we have so much space devoted to detailed reports of Vigilance Committees, rather than a philosophic review of the causes underlying reformatory processes: the influx of families—the establishment of homes—the change of traffic from speculation to steady business habits; why we have so much of James King of William, the local reformer, and so little of Thomas Starr King, the continental patriot. We prefer to accept this theory, rather than believe that the author was so far influenced by the habits and profession of journalism as to reproduce only contemporaneous and half-formed criticism. The best evidence that he has erred rather in deference to local sentiment, is shown in the fact that the only adverse criticisms of the work are based upon the incorrectness and wrong spelling of some of the prominent names after the conquest! We can easily imagine that it is of tremendous importance to Californians that Philip T. Herbert should be substituted for Philip Herbert, A. A. Sargeant for A. M. Sargeant, Louis McLane for Lonis McLeau, and Harry I. Thornton for Harry L. Thornton, but that the opinion of Eastern readers will be affected by any such inaccuracy may be greatly doubted.

Notwithstanding this radical defect of subject, the author impresses the reader with two of the greatest excellencies of the historian—truth and impartiality. He has no particular party to write up, no policy to defend or strengthen. In one instance he exhibits a degree of courage and independence most noteworthy. He has dared to defend John Charles Fremont: to espouse his cause in the Kearny imbroglio—to accord to him those laurels as Pathfinder and Conqueror, which Californians, in that very spirit of personal and contemporaneous judgment so reprehensible in this volume, have of late years endeavored to withhold. He has done this boldly, in the face of public sentiment, which, by a system of logic entirely Californian, mingles Mariposa scheming, Palmer, Cook & Co., ultra political opinions, Missouri trials and proclamations, with Fremont's claims as a pioneer. He has followed Randolph in awarding praise to the self-sacrificing but purposeless labors of the old Fathers. What he has to say of praise is genially and cordially given; when he condemns, it is from the dispassionate and calm height of the historian. He is graceful, easy, readable, and sincere, and would have adorned a task more difficult and valuable than the one before us.

SCIENCE IN RELIGION.

WE were much struck with an article we found in an Eastern religious paper to the effect that science is moving faster than theology. And it is true that the church is behind the age in all respects; that the daily discoveries made in physics are destructive of many of the doctrines taught by theology, and that the church does not come up to these truths in a manner calculated to preserve its integrity and influence. Ethnology, for example, promulges a denial of the scriptural theory of the origin of the human species from one Adam. Churchmen will not, or do not reason or explain away what science teaches, or show it consistent with Biblical narrative; they shrug their shoulders and remain silent. And so when geology irrefragably proves that the Mosaic chronology in regard to the age of the earth is false, and that creation is the result of slow and unceasing natural principles operating through myriads of years, rather than the result of a week's work, the church sits with folded hands and voiceless tongue, and makes no efforts to reconcile the laws of periods and strata with revelation—or, if they cannot be reconciled, to abandon the error and hold to the truth. It doesn't seem to have a proper estimate of the demands of the age; it has no missionaries in Literature and Science; it doesn't teach the popular mind; it doesn't combat what it calls "heresies"—heresies which are given to the world by the most illustrious names of the day, and supported by unerring facts. Apart from the teachings of crania and rocks, there has appeared within the past few years a set of vigorous and profound thinkers and logicians, whose writings are surely sapping the pulpit and its creeds to which a portion of the human race has so tenaciously clung through the last eighteen hundred years. Buckle, Spencer, Mill, Draper, and Lecky, called rationalistic writers, are exerting an influence through their powerful reasoning which the church should heed and meet. If these men seek to erect a system of error—if they declare and endeavor to propagate that which is false, then it is the duty of all churchmen to expose their fallacies. Men are naturally sceptical and irreligiously suspicious, and when brilliant and philosophical authors, professing to argue from natural phenomena attack and deride a system of theology, of the divinity of which men have many doubts why it behooves the best of the theologians to move rapidly with refutation—with dialectics to defend the faith, which, they say, equally with earth and its animals, is of divine creation.

Since the Augsburg confession, the human mind has been unceasingly pursuing the truth, and to-day as then, there are Luthers—Luthers everywhere—in Literature, Science, Society—active and untiring brains, on the scent for error, whether it exists in theology or elsewhere. Renan's Life of Jesus had its popularity more from the unsatisfactory nature of the proof which seeks to establish the Savior's claims as the Son of God, than from its beauty of rhetoric and its argument. It is true that the book in question is not considered logical; on the contrary, is specious, learned and cunning in sophistry, and altogether sophistical and full of dangerous devices, but it should be remembered that it is a senseless though characteristic churchusage to express ecclesiastical scorn of unbelief and heresy by an auto de fe of heretical books. Now-a-days people are not satisfied with and frightened by excommunication — by burning paper and type in the public market-places. They think and reason now where before the priesthood thought and reasoned for them. This is an age of opinion as Canning foretold it would be, and we want to be taught by argument; we want to be convinced—not persuaded by feeling and kept in the church by habit, association, and discipline. Besides, it is not encouraging that not one of the different ecclesiastical systems is an unit in itself. All of them are more or less riven by schisms. Bishop Colenso, by very many of the Church of England, is sustained; and the Privy Council declared that the doctrine of eternal punishment is not a necessary element of church creed. The Pope's encyclical letter against civil liberty, and the recent pastorals against Freemasonry and Fenianism, are not calculated to produce harmony and encourage religious sympathy. The truth is, at no period in the history of christianity has there been such wide-spread defection in religious societies as now. The church is fast losing its hold on the consciences and affections of men. People see and feel that a religion which is professed to be based on charity, on self-denying philanthropy, and peace on earth and good will towards all men, in its practice is bigoted, unprogressive, and worldly in all things, except precept. They see that those who are loudest in profession, and the most holy in observance, are, after all, the most corrupt. They see that the pulpit lends itself to stirring up and promoting political strife—revolution—blood; and that the clergy are quite as human as the laity—human in appetite—and as eager and cunning as the most of us in its gratification. They see that, while science is catholic, liberal, and advancing, the church grows narrower and more obstinate; and that that same science compels us to unlearn much that has been taught us by the church; that it lays bare errors; upheaves and topples over creed, and opens our eyes to an hundred fallacies.

These, some of the lessons taught us, and such the condition and opinions of two-thirds the civilized world to-day. But, thank God! outside of this ecclesiastical system—underlying all things, and with which there is in all science complete sympathy and confirmation — is a true religion, founded upon reason and instinct, and firmer than Earth itself. Modern progression teaches no atheism; it simply lifts us above cant, craft, and clerical dominion; it confirms the fundamental truths of Christianty, proving them to be unshaken and unshakable. Science and reason are foes only to that which false theology and priestcraft seek to engraft on the Christian system—not to the elementary truths of Christianity; and the sooner the merely human on it dies and sloughs off, the better for mankind, and the more rapid our progress to the ultimate perfection. It is true now as when Bacon first declared it, that "the depth of philosophy bringeth men's minds to religion"

NEW BOOKS.

WE have received from A. Roman & Co., a number of new publications, review of some of which must be deferred. There seems to be a wonderful activity in book-making, considering the unusual outlay involved—paper and other materials being still far above the oldtime rates. Roman & Co. are making additions to their list with the arrival of each steamer, and their establishment is at the same time a credit to our city and a convenience to the people of the Pacific coast. There are but few current publications in English which do not find their way to San Francisco, and certainly our leading book firms—Roman & Co. and H. H. Bancroft & Co.—are entitled to much praise for their energy and promptness in meeting the literary wants and tastes of this far-western community:

The Lost Tales of Miletus. By Edward Bulwer Lytton. New York: Harper & Brothers.

The most eminent writers of Europe seem to be finding their highest inspiration in classic land. The French Emperor, whose mind we would suppose to be occupied with affairs of state exclusively, finds time for a new life of Cæsar; an English Prime Minister translates Homer; the present Chancellor of the Exchequer turns from the dry calculations of the Budget to a new rendering of the Iliad into English metre; Grote, from Grecian history, applies himself to its philosophy, and gives us Plato and Other Companions of Socrates; Swinburne charms us with the sweetest and the most chaste classic poem of the day, Atalanta in Calydon, and Bulwer adds to the list The Lost Tales of Miletus. These are Hellenic myths in a "new combination of blank or rhymeless metre, not hitherto adapted for narrative purposes." We must confess that we have such a partiality for the old heroic verse of the Iliad and Æneid, that even in the class of composition to which these tales belong, we prefer the antique metre, or the prose in which they were originally written. We will say here that Aristides, an historian of Miletus, invented what were called Tales of Miletus—pictures that were amatory and free in character. They were translated into Latin in the time of Scylla, but they have been entirely lost.

Bulwer's prose rather than his poetry will carry him down to posterity. His renditions into English verse of Schiller's Poems and Ballads, the first edition of which was issued in 1844, and the next twenty years later, is his most reputable poetical effort. And yet the idiosyncracy of that translation is Bulwer's—not Schiller's. While Bulwer's undoubted ability must always secure him readers in any literary effort he may endeavor, yet the reading classes of these and the coming days will always prefer his prose writings. These Lost Tales are full of fine conceits, expressed in good phrase, bearing throughout the scholarly touch and the fine imagery which distinguish his writings—metrical and prose. The Oread's Son is perhaps the finest of the collection, both in rhythm and sentiment—if this "new combination of rhymeless metre" can be said to possess rhythm. It seems the most faithful to our idea of an antique poem, unsuited as the metre is, according to our notion, to poetical expression.

Eccentric Personages. By Wm. Russell, L.L.D. New York: American News Company.

These are anecdotal biographies, very readable and amusing. Before we opened the book, we thought the title an odd one for a person of Wm. H. Russell's peculiar calibre. Travels, pictures of political, social and war life: these seem to be specialities of the correspondent of the London Times; and while the book in question has much of the piquancy and brilliant narrative of "Bull Run Russell," yet we fancy he had nothing to do with its composition. It seems a compilation made up from both English and French sources. Many of the characters are persons more or less mixed up with history and narrative during the past two centuries, and many of the anecdotes and incidents collected in this work most of us never met before. This class of literature is entertaining and instructive, when properly selected. It perpetuates individual traits and peculiarities, with which mere history rarely meddles; it furnishes us with what may not be inaptly termed cartes de visite of such personages.

This book is English in prejudice and style. It amuses one when it says, speaking of Margaret Fuller's letters on England, "that they were not more stupid and half so malignant as the rantipole rubbish lately written and printed by Hawthorne." In the great Westminster Abbey of Letters where Hawthorne has gone, such attacks can never be heard."

Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers—By Aytown. New York: Widdleton.

This edition differs in nothing from that of 1852 except in the matter of paper and typography. These poems are too well known to need praise at this period. As a contributor to Blackwood, in which magazine these "Lays" first appeared, the "Bon Gaultier" of the Book of Ballads, the author of Bothwell, and as a powerful political writer, Aytown will always have an enviable place in English literature. These "Lays," in force, beauty and sympathy, rank among the first of all National Ballads. If Aytown had written nothing but "The Execution of Montrose," it would have gained him a proud position as a poet.

Ænone: A Tale of Slave Life in Rome. Bradburne.

An anonyme, recently arrived from New York, the plot of which is laid at the time when Paul left tent-making and took to preaching. As a picture of social life in Rome in 80 A. D., it has no merit, and in composition and spirit it is equally tame, whether we reduce it to the classical or modern standard. It bears about the same relation to a well-written book as Pansa's wall frescoes—done under the same reign at Pompeii—to the paintings of Zeuxis.

ROSES.

AS it may be interesting to the rose amateur to know something of the history of his favorites, we here give a few notes on the subject.

Those of our readers who may travel in foreign lands will be enabled to discover, in the course of their journeys, the parents of those varieties whose beauty gives them so much gratification at home.

The Provence Rose is a native of Mount Caucasus and the south of France. From a district in the latter country it derives its name. It is there, however, distinguished, not by the name which it bears with us, but by its more strictly botanical title of Rose a cent Feuilles or Rosa centifolia of Botanists. It was introduced into England about the close of the sixteenth century.

The Moss Rose belongs to the Provence family. The Mossy de Meaux is a most attractive little rose, and when grown on its own roots will live long and blossom freely. The favorite semi-double crimson moss, Du Luxemburg, was raised in the gardens of the Luxemburg Palace at Paris, while the finest rose-colored moss which we have, Laneii, was originated in the seed-buds of Monsieur Laffay, and called after a distinguished English rose grower.

The Damask Rose, (Rosa Damascena,) comes from Syria. It grows there in the greatest abundance. For more than a century after its introduction it remained unimproved, but, by care and attention to growing and hybridizing, it has produced some splendid varieties such as "Madame Hardy" of the finest whites and "Madame Zoutmau," an exquisitely tinted white which no cultivator should be without.

The sweet variety, called the Scotch rose, (Rosa Spinossissima,) is a native of Great Britain. By cultivation, some pretty varieties of yellow roses have been obtained from it, as "Josephus," "Lady Stuart," and also the "Yellow," which was first produced in France.

Austrian Briar, (R Luted,) is well known in its two single varieties, the single yellow and the copper-colored.

The Persian Yellow is one of the finest. This was brought from Asia by Sir H. Willock in 1838.

The Boursault, or Rosa Alipina, is from the southerly range of the Alps. It derives its floricultural name from M. Boursault, of Paris, with whom originated the first double variety of the "Old Double Red."

The Rosa Multiflora, the type of a numerous class, was introduced from China and Japan, by Thunberg, about sixty years ago. "Laura Davoust" is one of the finest of this class.

The Banksian Rose, (Rosa Banksia,) is a native of Georgia and Tartary. It was also introduced from China about 1807. This variety is much admired from its small though graceful and abundant bloom, resembling in size and form the "Bachelor's Button." So freely do roses of this family grow, that an instance is recorded by Deslongchamps, in his work on the rose, of a plant of the White Banksian at Toulon, which twenty years ago had the following dimensions: Its stem at the base was 9 inches in diameter; its branches covered a space containing nearly 140 square yards of surface, and it was computed that at one time it bore about 50,000 blossoms, thus presenting a most gorgeous spectacle.

The China Rose, (Rosa Indica,) was introduced about 1718. Since then it has been a universal favorite, this popularity arising not only from the perfume and beauty of its blossoms, but from the duration of its flowering season. It has been the parent of many fine varieties, distinct in their habits and their hues. "Mrs. Bosanquet" is one of its finest white descendants. From this we have a gradation of tints till we reach the deep crimson displayed in "Joseph Deschieus."

The Crimson China (Rosa Semperfloreus) is considered as an allied, though still a distinct division of the same group. It, too, has proved the parent of many varieties, varied in their colors, but all deserving of regard. We have the rose commonly known as the White China, evidently a member of this family with its snowy blooms, the vivid rose-hue of "Leonidas" and the unequalled crimson of Cramoisie Superieure.

The Tea Rose (Rosa Indica adorata) is the name of a class to which belong perhaps the most attractive of our varieties. It is, like the (Rosa Semperfloreus,) closely allied to the Chinese rose. It is, however, a distinct species. It differs from the Chinese in its habit, its color, and in the colors which its descendants assume.

The Blush variety—the original of the class—was brought from China in 1810. In 1824, the Yellow Tea Rose was discovered by Mr. Parker; and these varieties, by crossing, have given birth to a progeny most distinguished for their beauty It is within this family that our loveliest yellow fawn and cream-colored favorites are to be found. We have the gorgeous Devoniensis, whose blooms often measure four and five inches in diameter; the fawn buds and blooms of Safrano, the golden yellow of Vicomtesse de Cazes, and lastly, we have one of the gems of the Rosarium, the magnificent Gloire de Dijon. This fine Rose, with its cream-colored blooms, tinted with fawn and blush, is certainly the queen of the class to which it belongs. Its blossoms have the valuable property of keeping a long time after they are cut. Remarks on this subject will be continued next week.

WHAT THE SUN DOES.

WHO created the aliment? The Sun—himself created by the Great Maker of all things. Here again, therefore, the life and strength possessed by an animal are actually engendered by the sun.

Throughout your whole existence you will find, by following up the same reasoning, that your most trifling act, your most thoughtless movement, has derived its origin from the sun. A blow with the fist, a breath, a sigh, can be exactly estimated in rays of sunshine. Whether you trifle or whether you work, to make such an effort you have been obliged to expend so much strength; and that strength had already been stored in you by the sun, through the agency of a series of transformations. Your clothing is all borrowed from the sun. It is he who has spun every thread of your linen, and fed every fibre of your cloth and flannel. He either bleaches it snowy white, or dyes it purple and scarlet with indigo and madder. He furnishes leather for useful service, and furs and feathers for finery and parade. He gives you your bedding; whether you repose luxuriously between eider-down and wool, or stretch your weary limbs on straw, chaff, Indian corn-husks, seaweed, or even on a naked plank, as is the lot of not a few, it is the sun who gives both the one and the other. And what do we receive from regions where the sun, as it were, is not—from the immediate neighborhood of either pole? We receive just nothing. We cannot even get to them. The absence of the sun bars our progress with an impenetrable zone of ice and snow.

In like manner, your fine cellars of hock, burgundy, and claret, are nothing but bottled sunshine from the banks of the Rhine, the slopes of the Cote d'Or, and the pebbly plain of the Medoc. Your butter and cheese are merely solid forms of sunshine absorbed by the pastures of Holland or Cambridgeshire. Your sugar is crystallized sunshine from Jamaica. Your tea, quinine, coffee, and spice, are embodiments of solar influences shed on the surfaces of China, Peru, and the Indian Archipelago. It is the sun's action which sends you to sleep in opium, poisons you in strychnine, and cures in decoctions of tonic herbs. You taste the sun in your sauces, eat him in your meats, and drink him even in your simplest beverage—water. Without the sun, no blood could flow in your veins; your whole corporeal vitality, your very bodily life, is the result of the overflowings of his bounty.

Nor is this all we owe to our great central luminary. The physical forces with which we are acquainted—heat, light, electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, and motion—dancing their magic round, and alternately assuming each other's form and action, and now believed in all probability to be one in their common birth and origin—are direct emanations from the sun.—Albion.

AMUSEMENTS.

AT the Academy of Music, Henry Dunbar kept the stage until last night. It did not prove so successful as other plays of Tom Taylor's. The dramatization of an intricate story, even by a veteran play-writer, requires more tact and talent than the creation of a play. The dramatist is constantly bewildered by the kaleidscopic peculiarities of the characters, and their relations to each other and the plot, and, in his endeavors to conscientiously preserve these, he generally produces a kind of dramatic mélange from the novelist's pages, which is served up on the stage with all the mixed flavor of the various elements of the novel, but lacking its connecting links and its interest.

Mrs. Harry Jackson produced Lady Audley's Secret last evening, for her benefit, which was largely attended. The same play will be the attraction for to-day's matinée. Lost in London will fill the bill to-night, for the last time, and it should fill the house.

Edwin Forrest will open the new season at Maguire's Opera House on Monday evening next, with his great impersonation of "Cardinal Richelieu," in Bulwer's play of that name. The sale of tickets yesterday for the choice of seats for the opening night brought out some spirited bidding, and can be taken as a criterion of the unusual excitement prevailing in regard to the Forrest season. The first ticket was sold to R. J. Tiffany, the hatter, for $500; others ranged from forty-five dollars to five. The present company at the Academy will support Forrest at the Opera House, with the addition of Mrs. Judah and Miss Lillie. Mr. J. McCullough is to play on the off-nights.

The Opera House has undergone a more thorough improvement than is generally supposed. The parquette has been lowered, provided with a new floor, and extended back some twelve feet, giving place for twenty additional benches. It has also been flanked by eight new private boxes; it is provided with three new entrances, and two additional passages for exit, in cases of panic or accident, which also add greatly to the ventilation of the theatre. The upper circle has been remodelled, and every seat in the house re-cushioned in an elegant manner. The body of the building has been decorated in white and gold by Mr. Frank Jones; the proscenium frescoed by Messrs. A. and T. Torning, whose brushes have also been busy in providing new scenery. Enlarged stage accommodations have been made, and the vestibule, ticket offices and entrances greatly improved. The whole outlay of renovation and remodelling is said to have cost nearly $6,000.

The production of that operatic, spectacular, and legendary play, the Mountain Sylph, at the Metropolitan, has been the event of the week. It was placed on the stage in a most thorough and creditable manner, and, apparently, regardless of expense. Some very fine scenic effects have been produced, which it would be almost impossible to describe in such a manner as to be understood by the reader. These spectacular pieces, like Fourth of July fire-works, the rainbow, and the aurora borealis, appeal directly to the sense of vision, and their beauties must be seen to be appreciated. We can only say that the Mountain Sylph, in stage effects, music, scenery, etc., excels all the other plays of a similar character that have of late become so familiar to the public. The principal part falls to the lot of the lady manager, Mrs. Sedley Brown, who enacts the difficult role of the "Sylph" very effectively. Thompson, as "Christie," a comic rustic swain, has again made his mark by giving a capital piece of acting. Signor Carmini Morley, Mr. S. W. Leach, Miss Julia Gould, and the quartette from "The Twelve," enliven the piece with some beautiful operatic gems. The houses have been very good, notwithstanding the unpropitious weather. The piece will be given for a matinée to-day, for this evening's bill, and every night next week.

The circus swims on the top wave of public patronage, and is doing an excellent business, giving a good and varied performance, and pleasing everybody. Unless business falls off it will probably remain here indefinitely. The numerous feats of the wonderful Lee and Siegrist families and Messrs. Ryland, Frankliu, and others, the eccentric performances of the trained dogs, etc., etc., make a good programme. Performances this afternoon and evening and every evening next week.

A visit to the Anatomical Museum will instruct those who wish to learn the mysteries of "the tenement which the soul inhabits," and impart much useful information which could be acquired in no other way.

CONSUMPTION,

NIGHT SWEATS, AND PULMONARY DISEASES.

Read the following:

REMARKABLE CURE.

San Francisco, September 5th, 1865.

I desire to make known the fact that I was afflicted with a very bad cough for fifteen years, and, during this time, used everything which I could hear of without getting the better of my disease, until I tried Dr. D. B. Vincent's Cold Preventative or Cough Mixture, which cured me sound and well.

NEWTON MOORE.

This is to certify that my wife has been troubled with indigestion for nearly eighteen months, and, by using one bottle of Dr. Vincent's medicine, has been completely cured.

San Francisco, April 6th, 1866.

JOHNSON J. THOMAS.

San Francisco, July 17th, 1865.

I hereby certify that, having had a Cough some five months since, which had troubled me for two years, and I was so bad that I was able to do but little labor of any kind, and could not walk fast without putting myself out of breath. I was so far gone that I had chills over me and night sweats, and had what other physicians called disease of the lungs. I had been doctoring a part of the time for the last year, when I saw Dr. D. B. Vincent, and he gave me a small vial of medicine, which relieved me of the chills and night sweats, and the cough entirely went away, and I do not take cold so easy, and my health is much better in every respect. My appetite is much better; and I heartily recommend all others who are afflicted with similar complaints to him.

JOHN O'NEILL, National Hotel.

The above named diseases nearly all originate from the same or similar causes, and will cure all of them. It is a sure cure for Dyspepsia. Price, 50 cents per bottle.

AN AWKWARD MEETING.

HERE is a Parisian story whose hero is an artist. A few weeks since the Marchioness de ——, a stately lady of ancient family in Faubourg St. Germain, asked one of her old friends to get a drawing-master for her two daughters. Great stress was properly laid on the habits and manners of the drawing-master; it was necessary he should be talented, respectable and very sedate and grave. Her friend obtained for her the services of an able artist who possessed all the desired qualities, and gave the artist a letter of introduction to her. When the artist called at the old family mansion in Faubourg St. Germain he was told the Marchioness was absent, but was momentarily expected and had given orders to show him into the drawing-room if he came while she was away. He was shown into the grand old room which looked so like one of the saloons of Versailles, the artist could scarcely refrain from thinking he must be in Louis XIV.'s palace. To pass away the time, the artist examined the articles placed on a stand with shelves on one side of the fire-place. They were objects of art collected in Italy and Germany. While examining one of the articles whose nature and use defied his acuteness, a portion of it fell down his sleeve, and, in his effort to recover it, the portion fell down his drawers. He was greatly embarrassed. Were he to undress to get it, there was danger the mistress of the house would return at a most critical moment of the preeess—so that was not to be thought of. He shook himself almost to pieces, with no result but to drive the object into his boots. To pull off boots and stockings in a drawing-room of the Faubourg St. Germain was as heinous an offence against good manners as to undress. At last he remembered his skill in walking on his hands, and he argued that as the reversal of a bottle brought to the orifice the objects at the bottom, so if a man placed his heels over his head, the heels would surrender all unattached objects which might be at them. Time pressed, and he at once turned a half-somerset and stood on his hands, his feet in the air. He walked about the room in this position, kicking his heels together to accelerate the fall of the object in his boots. The noise he made by kicking his heels together prevented him from hearing the door open, and as his face was directed to the floor, he could not see that several persons had entered the room. The new-comers were the Marchioness and her daughters. I cannot pretend to express their surprise at seeing a gentleman promenading about the drawing-room on his hands. You may easier conceive it. They stood for some minutes in silent confusion. A turn in his course brought the artist's face in their direction, he looked up, and, before I can describe it, was on his feet and as silent and confused as they had been. He fully expected to be shown the door. A smile on the Marchioness's face reassured him. He confessed to her what had occurred. She laughed heartily over it, gave him her hand, and became at once his warm friend.

THEATRICAL CRITICISM—RICHELIEU.

SCENE—Stalls in Drury Lane Theatre. Time—after seven.

Newly-married Wife (to Newly-married Husband, who, she supposes, knows everything)—John, who wrote this "Richelieu?"

Newly-married Husband (rather startled by this sudden search after knowledge)—Who wrote "Richelieu?" (Feels that if he hasn't an answer ready, his authority is in danger.) Who— (Wife is about to repeat the question, when her husband takes advantage of a movement on the stage to check her inquiries by saying, in a whisper) Sssssh! I'll tell you presently.

[Young Wife's attention is hereby directed to the stage, and newly-married gentleman obtains a respite.]

Young Lady (of High Church tendencies, to her sister)—He was a Cardinal (alluding to Mr. Phelps.) I wish the Bishop of Oxford was dressed like that. Wouldn't it be grand?

Sister (argumentative young lady)—But Richelieu wasn't a bishop.

First Young Lady—O yes, he was. (To Uncle George, who in another two minutes would have been asleep)—Wasn't he uncle?

Uncle George—Eh, my dear? What? Eh?

[Inclines his ear to his niece, trying to keep his eyes fixed on the stage at the same time, in case she may ask him about what's going on.]

First Young Lady—Richelieu was a bishop, wasn't he?

Uncle George (who up to this moment has not considered the subject)—O yes, he was a—at least he wasn't exactly what we call a bishop—he was a (pulls himself together with a strong effort, and calls to mind a history of England, with pictures, that he used to read when a boy)—a Prime Minister.

First Young Lady (surprised, but glad to exhibit her knowledge of these subjects)—O like Lord John Russell?

Uncle George (finds that he really has quite forgotten his history)—No—no—(taking refuge under the show of promoting instruction, with good humored severity.) You ought to read it.

First Young Lady—What, uncle?

Uncle George (who would like to answer "books" generally, replies hurriedly)—The history of—

[Shakes his head at the two girls, as much as to say, "You're interrupting the performance;" frowns at the stage, smiles, and says, "Ssssh!" The nieces determine to have it out afterwards.]

Critical Young Gentleman ("reading law" in the Temple)—I enjoy seeing Shakspeare.

Charles, his friend (a drawing-room amateur)—Yes, but this isn't Shakspeare.

Critical Young Gentleman (apparently amused at his own ignorance)—That's funny. I always thought it was Shakspeare's.

[Refers to his bill, and finds that he has been looking at a prospective advertisement of "Shylock."]

Charles, his friend (who has no bill to refer to)—Did you? (Thinks it, on the whole, as well to change the subject)—Have you seen the pantomime here?

Critical Young Gentleman—No. But that's very odd about Shakspeare. I wonder how I got that into my head. Of course, it's by—by——

Thinks of Sheridan Knowles, but his friend gives him no assistance.

Man in the pit, close behind—Sssssh!

[Charles, his friend, blesses Man in Pit. Critical Young Gentleman looks round defiantly at Man in the Pit; Man in the Pit cracks a nut, and the piece proceeds.]

Theatrical person with an order, and a stout lady in Dress Circle—Phelps is very good in this.

Stout Lady—He looks exactly like—Lor,' what's his name?—Beldemonio——

Theatrical Person—O, Fechter, not a bit——

Stout Lady (annoyed)—Not Fechter—Lor' no. The old Cardinal in that. He's the same, isn't he?

Theatrical Person—No (puzzled)—yes—at least it's the same time. But his name was—dear me—(thinks)——

Stout Lady—Fiftus something—Fiftus the Sixth.

Theatrical Person (right at last)—No, no, you mean Sixtus the Fifth. (Loudly, for the information of the audience)—Yes, Sixty-six. I mean Sixtus the Sixth—no, Fifth—same time as Richelieu.

Audience, (to Theatrical Person—Sssssssh!

[Theatrical Person pities them, and holds his tongue.]

[At the end of Act I., the Newly-married Gentleman has discovered, from his bill, that Richelieu lived in the time of Louis the Thirteenth. This, in a weak moment, he communicates to his wife:]

Newly-Married Young Lady—O, yes, dear, I see. But I always confused him with Mazarin. (Newly-married Gentleman smiles feebly, and wishes he hadn't spoken)—Was Mazarin after or before Richelieu?

Newly-Married Young Gentleman—Oh, he was—er—(Looks at nothing through his opera glasses)—he was—(stands up in the stalls to give himself time)—oh (boldly)—he was after—yes, after Richelieu. (Uses opera-glasses vaguely.)

First Swell (who has come in during the first Act, to his friend)—Doosid handsome dressing-gown the old boy (meaning Mr. Phelps) had on. Eh?

Second Swell—Yaas; turned up with fur. Think I shall have one made like it.

First Swell (languidly)—What's the story of this thing, eh?

Second Swell (not to be outdone)—Oh, I don't know. Can't say much for the gals in it, eh? [Looks about.]

Elderly Gentleman from the Country (in the Pit, with a last week's bill of the Merchant of Venice bought outside the theatre)—Capital! First-rate! (At supper he tells his friends how delighted he's been with Mr. Phelps as "Shylock.")—Punch.

HOMESTEADS.—Those beautiful Homestead Lots located in the best portion of the Encinal, at Alameda, opposite the new hotel at the Alameda Railroad Station, will be sold at auction by Maurice Dore & Co. on Wednesday next. They are covered with large evergreen oaks, possess a rich alluvial soil, and are almost free from the searching visits of those summer winds that intrude so roughly in every nook and corner of the San Francisco peninsula. The ferry and railcar make the trip to and from in thirty minutes. These lots in a few years will probably quadruple their present value, and must prove profitable as investments solely. *

MEAGHER, TAAFFE, & Co. announce elsewhere in our paper a catalogue of dress and family dry goods which they have recently purchased at auction sales, and are prepared to sell at prices greatly under the usual rates. The immense capital and resources of this firm enable them to purchase their goods in New York at invoice sales, or import direct from manufacturer for their wholesale and retail houses in this city at the lowest prices, and sell them here over their counters proportionally low. See their advertisement. *

SCHOOL BOOKS AND STATIONERY.—Tyler Brothers have just opened a branch store in the "Nucleus" Building, corner of Market and Third streets, thoroughly stocked with school books, stationery, juvenile books and fancy articles, making this line of business a speciality of the "branch." Ladies and scholars will find every description of school and fancy stationery at Tyler's new Branch, and can have their stationery stamped to order with colored initials, etc., in the most tasty manner. *

THE SNOW.

OH! the snow, the beautiful snow,
Filling the sky and the earth below;
Over the housetops, over the street,
Over the heads of the people you meet;
Dancing,
Flirting,
Skimming along—
Beautiful snow! It can do no wrong!
Flying to kiss a fair lady's cheek;
Clinging to lips in frolicsome freak;
Beautiful snow from the heavens above,
Pure as an angel, and fickle as love!

Oh! the snow, the beautiful snow!
How the flakes gather and laugh as they go!
Whirling about in its maddening fun,
It plays in its glee with every one.
Chasing,
Laughing,
Hurrying by,
It lights up the face, and it sparkles the eye;
And even the dogs, with a bark and a bound,
Snap at the crystals that eddy around;
The town is alive, and its heart in a glow
To welcome the coming of the beautiful snow.

How the wild crowd goes swaying along,
Hailing each other with humor and song!
How the gay sledges like meteors pass by,
Bright for the moment, then lost to the eye;
Ringing,
Swinging,
Dashing they go,
Over the crust of the beautiful snow!
Snow so pure when it falls from the sky,
To be trampled in mud by the crowd rushing by;
To be tracked and trampled by thousands of feet,
Till it blends in the filth of the horrible street!

Once I was pure as the snow, but I fell;
Fell, like the snow-flakes from heaven—to hell!
Fell to be trampled as filth of the street;
Fell, to be scoffed at, to be spit on, and beat!
Pleading,
Cursing,
Dreading to die;
Selling my soul to whoever would buy;
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread;
Hating the living and fearing the dead.
Merciful God! have I fallen so low?
And yet I was once like this beautiful snow!

Once I was fair as the beautiful snow,
With an eye like its crystals, a heart like its glow;
Once I was loved for my innocent grace—
Flattered and sought for the charm of my face.
Father,
Mother,
Sister, all,
God, and myself, I have lost by my fall!
The veriest wretch that goes shivering by
Will take a wide sweep, lest I wander too nigh;
For of all that is on or about me, I know
There is nothing that's pure but the beautiful snow!

How strange it should be that the beautiful snow
Should fall on a sinner with nowhere to go!
How strange it would be when the night comes again,
If the snow and the ice struck my desperate brain;
Fainting,
Freezing,
Dying alone!
Too wicked for prayer, too weak for my moan
To be heard in the crash of the crazy town,
Gone mad in their joy at the snow's coming down;
To lie and to die in my terrible woe,
With a bed and a shroud of the beautiful snow!

FACTS VS. THEORIES.—"Give me a place to rest my lever on," says Archimedes, "and I will move the world." "Give me pure and unadulterated drugs," says Medicus, of the olden time, "and I will cure disease."

In one sense, both of these learned pundits were the veriest charlatans. They knew there was no place to rest their lever on, either to move the world or cure disease. Mechanism was in a backward state, and the medical profession was but another name for sorcery, and all the adjuncts of magic filters and charms of the "evil eye," etc.

But these latter days have borne unto us something more than even superstition and its crew ever dreamt of in their maddest philosophy. In these days of practical science, what was theory of yesterday is fact to-day, and all the old time notions become as bubbles in the sun, and burst and break with every breath we draw.

Let Archimedes shoulder his lever and we will find a resting place for it to move the world. Let mine ancient Medicus pant and toil no more for the drugs he so sorely needs, for we have them at our hand, ever ready to serve them at his beck.

Refined in the laboratory of Dr. Maggiel, the finest materials known in the medical profession are obtainable by any one. His Bilious, Dyspeptic, and Diarrhea Pills stand unrivalled, and his Salve operates with magical effect upon burns, scalds, and all sores and ulcers of the skin.

In fact, we think MAGGIEL'S Pills and Salve are the wonder of this century, and we are happy in the thought that many others of our brethren of the craft agree with us. We would earnestly counsel that all families provide themselves with Dr. Maggiel's Preparations at once, and keep them ready at hand, so as to use them at the most opportune time and as occasion serves.—Valley Sentinel. *

It is exactly for these indescribable complaints that PLANTATION BITTERS nre prepared. It is for the relief of these same complaints they have become so famous. Hence it is that they are so extensively used by elergymen, merchants, ladies, and persons of sedentary habits. They are as pleasant to the taste as they are beneficial to the Stomach. MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means thnt promised relief, hut without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not hy defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruiu of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute iu a manuer that must be gratifyiug to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasnre. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is ahle to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons ufflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; nt all events, it can do no harm, as for counsltation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on ohedience to his advice uuless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even months of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical inefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, and is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered the most excruciating pains for about five weeks, without any hope of relief, when a friend, hearing of my illness, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," and go to you, that you would have me walking nhout the streets in three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, and carried into it hy three stout men, and was hy them lifted into the hath, yet, on coming out of the hath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, and without assistance walked from the hath to the carriage. On the fourth day, I discharged my carriage and walked with a friend's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) and home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all pain and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its own work among such of my friends and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your friend, JOSEPH SPARROW.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

A CARD.

M. Howard's Hair Restorative,

NO. 315 MONTGOMERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract.

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but,

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION, we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial. Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,
Female Complaints,
Fever and Ague
Headache,
Indigestion,
Influenza,
Inflammation,
Inward Weakness,
Liver Complaint,
Lowness of Spirits,
Ringworm,
Rheumatism,
Salt Rheum,
Scalds,
Skin Diseases.

NOTICE.—None genuine without the engraved trade-mark around each pot or box, signed by Dr. J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton st., New York, to counterfeit which is felony.

☞ Sold by all respectable Dealers in Medicines throughout the United States—at 25 cents per box or pot. ap14-1y

COULD HE REFUSE?

THE text of the letter which the Mayor of Wareham addressed to the Prince of Wales when he wanted a five-pound note from his royal highness to repair the cupola of his town-hall has been published. It runs thus:

"North-street, parish of St. Martin, old corporate borough of Wareham, Dorset. To H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, K. S.I. and K.G. From the mayor of the above-named borough. May it please your royal highness—Application has several times been made to me, as the mayor of this borough, touching the dangerous condition of the cupola of the town hall, including the tower in which the bell is which summons the members of the corporation to their public meetings, and I have this day been officially to the top of it to inspect the state in which it really is. It requires immediate repair, and I have given instructions accordingly. The estimated cost is from £7 to £8. There is no corporate fund for the purpose. As an old servant of your much lamented, noble, royal, and most useful (to his fellow-creatures) deceased father, I humbly crave leave to name the subject to yourself, though not having the smallest right to take such a liberty, for the purpose of affording your royal highness an opportunity of directing that a donation should be given in your name towards the object, if it should seem meet to you to do so; and though it would scarcely add to the popularity and thorough good-will which attaches to the name of the eldest son of Queen Victoria, and those near to him and her, still it would be thoroughly appreciated and widely made known to the intense satisfaction of all who hear it, and appreciate the town of Wareham as it deserves, both as regards old and new associaciations. The present mayor does not deserve ill of those whom he now addresses, and it is more for the sake of the name of his royal highness than of the money. There are those who possibly might help to contribute to the funds, but could not give the name of weight. At any rate, the mayor would, sincerely and earnestly, as well as humbly, congratulate his royal highness upon the possession of two such fine promising little sons—the growing hope of the nation, as well as of their royal parents and relatives. The mayor feels that in thus placing Wareham before the Prince of Wales he has done what is right, and waits for a reply (through some one of the courteous and really sensible gentlemen who will send it,) in the confidence that, whatever the tenor, it will be treasured up as a pleasant memorial with others. Your royal highness's obedient, humble, and faithful servant, Freeland Filliter, Mayor of Wareham, Dorsetshire."

A QUAKER WOMAN'S SERMON.—"My dear friends, there are three things I very much wonder at. The first is, that children should be so foolish as to throw stones, clubs, and brickbats up into fruit trees, to knock down fruit; if they would let it alone, it would fall itself. The second is, that men should be so foolish, and even so wicked, as to go to war and kill each other; if let alone, they would die themselves. And the third and last thing that I wonder at is, that young men should be so unwise as to go after the young women; if they would stay at home, the young women would come after them."

A REPRESENTATIVE AMERICAN ACTOR.

THE arrival of Edwin Forrest on our shores is an epoch in the histrionic page of the Pacific coast.

Independent of the absorbing desire to witness the varied representations of human life, by this wonderful delineator, we feel a national pride in welcoming one who, perhaps more than any living artist, is the very embodiment of the American character. Mr. Forrest is eminently and distinctively American. Born in the city of Philadelphia, within sound of that bell which proclaimed aloud the inscription on its periphery, "Liberty to all the world;" reared and taught, or rather self-taught, amid free institutions, struggling in early years with adverse fortune, his American perseveranee carved out the road to distinction; and once fairly on the track, his career has been onward and upward.

"Poeta nascitur non fit;" and the same may be said of the actor. Mr. Forrest is an exemplification of the adage, for he felt the powers within him and commenced his career at the early age of fifteen, and for many years grappled with adverse fate—deeming at one time five dollars a week a coveted income. We remember many years ago hearing him say, in New York, that when it was proposed to raise his pay to the princely sum of $25 a week, he deemed it fortunate that he lived in the city which boasted of a John Jacob Astor, for no less than a millionaire could command that sum weekly and regularly in gold. But during this period of his professional career, though but a boy in years he was silently but perseveringly and surely accumulating a power which was soon not only to astonish himself and his own countrymen, but to finally extort the reluctant tribute of praise from trans-Atlantic rivals. All this by the simple magic of unswerving self-reliance, indomitable perseverance, and a lofty genius, he has accomplished; and he now reposes in the undisputed possession of the histrionic sceptre.

The occasion of his first great triumph was at the old Park Theatre in New York, where at the earnest request of the favorite actor, Woodhull, he ventured on the part of "Othello," for that gentleman's benefit; and it was when he uttered the sentence,

> "I'd rather be a toad
> And live upon the vapors of a dungeon,
> Than keep a corner in the thing I love
> For others' uses," that thunders of applause shook the dome of that temple, such as it had seldom if ever heard before, and such as he himself has seldom heard since. From that moment the star of his destiny rose and carecred rapidly to the meridian.

Of the particulars of his personation, in San Francisco, of "Richelieu," during the current week, it is scarcely necessary to speak. Most of our readers have probably seen it for themselves, and we believe as appreciative an audience as our Eastern, or even trans-Atlantic cities, can boast, have unhesitatingly endorsed his performance as a triumph. His great achievement is not so much in representing, as in actually being, the hero. In his personations, we forget the actor, and see the character represented as actually before us. In the insight he gives us of other eras and other actors in life's grand drama, we imbibe volumes of history in a single evening. The great events and mighty geniuses of the past, the illustrated history of bygone ages, pass in living review before us, as a panorama from which we derive both pleasure and profit, and we devour a considerable portion of a small library at a single sitting.

But, in abstractly eulogizing the drama, we are digressing from the main object with which we commenced this article, which was not so much to criticise Mr. Forrest's specific style and personation of his subjects, as to speak of him as a true and sterling representative of America, our country, our people, our national traits, and even our institutions; of American self-reliance, energy, enterprise, perseverance, and ultimate sure success. It is that same American spirit or self-reliant greatness, which has produced a race of giants; which elevates the intellect, expands the mind, enlarges the heart, and ennobles the soul; which has drawn from poverty and obscurity the statesmanship of a Webster and a Clay; which has ennobled the name of Lincoln and a host of others; which has produced the steamboat of Fulton, the nail machine of Perkins, the printing press of Hoe, the sewing machine of Howe, and the lightning telegraph of Morse; which has consecrated such names, and hosts of others of our countrymen, as public benefactors, and as the true nobility of nature; and the elevating and expanding influence of whose light and warmth are even now irradiating distant nations, and will eventually spread itself over the whole earth.

We welcome, therefore, to our western homes our fellow-countryman, and trust that his success in his chosen vocation may stimulate our youth to new exertion; may bring to light many a hidden pearl, and successfully evoke the genius and latent talent of the statesman, the orator, the poet, the artizan, the mechanic, and the great minds of America in every department of science, manufactures, mechanics, and everything which may conduce to the welfare and happiness of man.

PITHY RESPONSES.—The Round Table says: "The misery of being called upon suddenly to make an extempore speech was once got over by a noted English mathematician, who delivered himself in this pithy and sensible fashion: 'Gentlemen, a morbid desire for originality prevents me from saying, This is the proudest moment of my life, and it does not occur to me to say anything else.' And a story is told of an Australian proprietor who resolutely refused to open his lips at a public dinner given in his honor, and designed as a tribute to endeavor and perseverance, as exemplified in his own rise from a humble rank: 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'what you have said is doubtless true, and certainly agreeable, but I never made but one speech in my life before any large number of people, and, short as it was, the result was so unfortunate, that I made up my mind never to make another.' Upon cross examination, it turned out that he alluded to his own trial at the Old Bailey about half a century ago, and that the speech he had made was: 'Not guilty, my lord;' in spite of which he had been transported for life."

IN EXTREMIS.—The following story is told of Fauntleroy, the famous forger: "An incident is related of his last moments which does not redound to the credit of all his friends. Among the delicacies he was in the habit of giving at his table was some remarkably fine Lunel, imported by himself, and kept to himself so far that he would never put any of his friends on the scent of it. The day before his execution some of his oldest friends came to take leave of him, and one outstayed the rest. 'Fauntleroy,' said this last visitor, with due solemnity, 'we have tried all means to save you; we have done everything in our power, but all is in vain, and we have only to take leave of you forever. Consider the position in which you stand. The dread vail of life is about to be withdrawn. You are on the brink of that chasm which separates time from eternity. If there is anything you leave unsaid in this world you will have no chance of saying it then. Is there nothing more you have to say to us? Do you not think you owe us some return for our exertions? It will soon be too late. Tell us where you get that Lunel.' But Fauntleroy was resolute. He died and made no sign."

EMBROIDERY.—There are two kinds of needlework called Russian embroidery; one is worked with canvas over the material, the threads of the canvas being pulled away when the work is completed; the other is worked on the material with fine black silk. Mexican embroidery is likewise worked with fine black silk. It is a button-hole stitch worked very far apart.

A PUNCTUAL MAN is very rarely a poor man, and never a man of doubtful credit. His small accounts are frequently settled, and he never meets with difficulty in raising money to pay large demands. Small debts neglected ruin credit, and, when a man has lost that, he will find himself at the bottom of a hill he can not ascend.

INCIDENTS OF THE PLAGUE IN LONDON—1665

"I HAD," says Defoe, "taken my friend the physician's advice, and locked myself and my family up, and resolved to suffer the hardship of living a few mouths without flesh-meat, rather than to purchase it at the hazard of our lives.

"But though I confined my family, I could not prevail upon my unsatified curiosity to stay within entirely myself; and though I generally came frightened and terrified home, yet I could not restrain; only that, indeed, I did not it so frequently as at first.

"In these walks I had many dismal scenes before my eyes, as, particularly, of persons falling dead in the streets, terrible shrieks and screechings of women, who, in their agonies, would throw open their chamber windows, and describe the variety of postures in which the passions of the poor people would express themselves.

"Passing through Token Honse-yard, in Lothbury, of a sudden a casement violently opened just over my head, and a woman gave three frightful screeches, and then cried, 'Oh, death, death, death!' in a most inimitable tone, and which struck me with horror, and a chilliness in my very blood. There was nobody to be seen in the whole street, neither did any other window open, for people had no curiosity now in any case, nor could anybody help one another; so I went on to pass into Bell-alley.

"Just in Bell-alley, on the right hand of the passage, there was a more terrible cry than that, though it was not so directed out at the window; but the whole family were in a terrible fright, and I could hear women and children run screaming about the rooms like distracted, when a garret-window opened, and somebody from a window on the other side the alley called and asked 'What is the matter?' Upon which, from the first window, it was answered, 'My old master has hanged himself!'

"It is scarcely credible what dreadful cases happened in particular families every day. People, in the rage of the distemper, or in the torment of their swellings, which was indeed intolerable, running out of their own government, raving and distracted, and oftentimes laying violent hands upon themselves, throwing themselves out at their windows, shooting themselves, etc. Mothers murdering their own children in their lunacy; some dying of mere grief, as a passion; some of mere fright and surprise, without any infection at all; others frightened into idiotism and foolish distractions; some into despair and lunacy; others into melancholy madness.

"The pain of the swelling was in particular very violent, and to some intolerable; the physicians and surgeons may be said to have tortured many poor creatures even to death. The swellings in some grew hard, and they applied violent drawing-plasters or poultices to break them; and if these did not do, they cut and scarified them in a terrible manner. In some, those swellings were made hard, partly by the force of the distemper, and partly by their being too violently drawn; and were so hard that no instrument could cut them; and then they burnt them with caustics, so that many died raving mad with the torment, and some in the very operation. In these distresses, some, for want of help to hold them down in their beds, or to look to them, laid hands upon themselves, as already stated; some broke out into the streets, perhaps naked, and would run directly down to the river, if they were not stopped by the watchmen, or other officers, and plunge themselves into the water wherever they found it.

"We had at this time a great many frightful stories told us of nurses and watchmen who looked after the dying people; that is to say, hired nurses, who attended infected people, using them barbarously, starving them, smothering them, or by other wicked means hastening their end; that is to say, murdering of them. And watchmen being set to guard houses that were shut up, when there has been but one person left, and perhaps that one lying sick, that they have broken in and murdered that body, and immediately throwing it out into the dead-cart; and so it has gone, scarcely cold, to the grave.

"I cannot say but that some such murders were committed, and I think two were sent to prison for it, but died before they could be tried: and I have heard that three others, at various times, were executed for murders of that kind But I must say I believe nothing of its being so common a crime as some have since been pleased to say.

"The robberies extended chiefly to wearing-clothes, linen, and what rings or money they could come at, when the person died who was under their care, but not to a general plunder of the houses; and I could give you an account of one of these nurses, who, several years after, being on her deathbed, confessed, with the utmost horror, the robberies she had committed at the time of her being a nurse, and by which she had enriched herself to a great degree; but as for murders, I do not find that there was ever any proof of the facts, in the manner as it has been reported, except as above.

"A neighbor and acquaintance of mine having some money owing to him from a shopkeeper in Whitecross street, or thereabouts, sent his apprentice, a youth about eighteen years of age, to endeavor to get the money. He came to the door, and finding it shut, knocked pretty hard, and, as he thought, heard somebody answer within, but was not sure, so he waited; and after some stay knocked again; and then a third time, when he heard somebody coming down stairs. At length the man of the house came to the door; he had on his breeches or drawers, and a yellow flannel waistcoat, no stockings, a pair of slipt shoes, a white cap on his head, and, as the young man said, death in his face. When he opened the door, says he, 'What do you disturb me thus for?' The boy, though a little surprised, replied, 'I come from such-a-one, and my master sent me for the money which he says you know of.' 'Very well, child,' returns the living ghost; 'call as you go by at Cripplegate church, and bid them ring the bell;' and with these words shut the door again, and went up and died the same day, nay, perhaps the same hour.

"This puts me in mind of John Hayward, who was at that time under-sexton of the parish of St. Stephen, Coleman street; by under-sexton was understood at that time grave-digger and bearer of the dead. This man carried, or assisted to carry, all the dead to their graves which were buried in that large parish, and who were carried in form; and after that form of burying was stopped, went with the dead-cart and the bell to fetch the dead bodies from the houses where they lay, and fetched many of them out of the chambers and houses; for the parish was, and is still remarkable, particularly above all the parishes in London, for a great number of alleys and thoroughfares, very long, into which no carts could come, and where they were obliged to go and fetch the bodies a very long way, which alleys now remain to witness it; such as White's-alley, Cross-Key-court, Swan-alley, Bell-alley, White Horse-alley, and many more. Here they went with a kind of handbarrow, and laid the dead bodies on, and carried them out to the carts; which work he performed, and never had the distemper at-all, but lived about twenty years after it, and was sexton of the parish to the time of his death. His wife, at the same time, was a nurse to infected people, and tended many that died in the parish, being for her honesty recommended by the parish officers; yet she was never infected. He never used any preservative against the infection other than holding garlic and rue in his mouth, and smoking tobacco; this I also had from his own mouth; and his wife's remedy was washing her head in vinegar, and sprinkling her head-clothes so with vinegar as to keep them always moist; and if the smell of any of those she waited on was more than ordinarily offensive, she snuffed vinegar up her nose, and sprinkled vinegar upon her head-clothes, and held a handkerchief, wetted with vinegar, to her mouth.

"It was under this John Hayward's care, and within his bounds, that the story of the piper, with which people have made themselves so merry, happened, and he assured me that it was true. It is said that it was a blind piper; but, as John told me, the fellow was not blind, but an ignorant weak poor man, and usually went his rounds about ten o'clock at night, and went piping along from door to door; and people usually took him in at public-houses where they knew him, and would give him drink and victuals, and sometimes farthings; and he in return would pipe and sing, and talk simply, which diverted people; and thus he lived. It was but a very bad time for this diversion while things were as I have told; yet the poor fellow went about as usual, but was almost starved; and when anybody would ask him how he did, he would answer, 'The dead-cart had not taken him yet, but that they had promised to call for him next week.'

"It happened one night that this poor fellow, whether somebody had given him too much drink or not, John Hayward said he had not drank in his house, but that they had given him a little more victuals than ordinary at a public-house in Coleman street; and the poor fellow having not usually had a bellyful, or perhaps not for a good while, was laid all along upon the top of a bulk or stall, and fast asleep, at a door in the street near London Wall, towards Cripplegate, and that upon the same bulk or stall, the people of some house, in the alley of which the house was a corner, hearing a bell, which they always rung before the cart came, had laid a body really dead of the plague just by him, thinking too that this poor fellow had been a dead body as the other was, and laid there by some of the neighbors.

"Accordingly, when John Hayward with his bell and the cart came along, finding two dead bodies upon the stall, they took them up with the instrument they used, and threw them into the cart; and all this while the piper slept soundly. From hence they passed along, and took in other dead bodies, till, as honest John Hayward told me, they almost buried him alive in the cart; yet all this while he slept soundly. At length the cart came to the place where the bodies were to be thrown into the ground, which, as I do remember, was at Mountmill; and as the cart usually stopped some time before they were ready to shoot out the melancholy load they had in it, as soon as the cart stopped, the fellow awaked, and struggled a little to get his head out from among the dead bodies, when, raising himself up in the cart, he called out, 'Hey, where am I?' This frightened the fellow that attended about the work; but, after some pause, John Hayward, recovering himself, said, 'Lord bless us, there's somebody in the cart not quite dead!' So another called him and said, 'Who are you?' The fellow answered, 'I am the poor piper: where am I?' 'Where are you?' says Hayward. 'Why, you are in the dead-cart, and we are going to bury you.' 'But I aint dead though, am I?' says the piper; which made them laugh a little, though, as John said, they were heartily frightened at first: so they helped the poor fellow down, and he went about his business.

The mortality reached its height in the month of September. In the beginning of that month the citizens were in a frenzy; they thought God had resolved to make an end of the city. Whole families, and indeed whole streets of families, were swept away together; insomuch that it was frequent for neighbors to call to the bell-man to go to such and such houses and carry out the people, for that they were all dead.

"As the desolation was greater during those terrible times, so the amazement of the people increased, and a thousand unaccountable things they would do in the violence of their fright, as others did the same in the agonies of their distemper; and this part was very affecting. Some went roaring, and crying, and wringing their hands along the streets; some would go praying and lifting up their hands to heaven, calling upon God for mercy. I cannot say, indeed, whether this was not in their distraction; but, be it so, it was still an indication of a more serious mind, when they had the use of their senses, and was much better, even as it was, than the frightful yellings and cryings that every day, and especially in the evenings, were heard in some streets. I suppose the world has heard of the famous Solomon Eagle, an enthusiast; he, though not infected at all, but in his head, went about denouncing of judgment upon the city in a frightful manner, sometimes quite naked, and with a pan of burning charcoal on his head. What he said or pretended, indeed, I could not learn.

"There were some people, however, who, notwithstanding the danger, did not omit publicly to attend the worship of God, even in the most dangerous times. And though it is true that a great many of the clergy did shut up their churches, and fled, as other people did, for the safety of their lives, yet all did not do so; some ventured to officiate, and to keep up the assemblies of the people by constant prayers, and sometimes sermons or brief exhortations to repentance and reformation; and this as long as they would hear them. And dissenters did the like also, and even in the very churches where the parish ministers were either dead or fled; nor was there any room for making any difference at such a time as this was.

"It pleased God that I was still spared, and very hearty and sound in health, but very impatient of being pent up within doors without air, as I had been for fourteen days or thereabouts; and I could not restrain myself, but I would go and carry a letter for my brother to the post-house; then it was, indeed, that I observed a profound silence in the streets. When I came to the post-house, as I went to put in my letter, I saw a man stand in one corner of the yard, and talking to another at a window, and a third had opened a door belonging to the office. In the middle of the yard lay a small leathern purse, with two keys hanging at it, with money in it, but nobody would meddle with it. I asked how long it had lain there; the man at the window said it had lain almost an hour, but they had not meddled with it, because they did not know but the person who dropped it might come back to look for it. I had no such need of money, nor was the sum so big that I had any inclination to meddle with it, or to get the money at the hazard it might be attended with; so I seemed to go away, when the man who had opened the door said he would take it up, but so, that if the right owner came for it, he should be sure to have it. So he went in, and fetched a pail of water, and set it down hard by the purse, then went again and fetched some gunpowder, and cast a good deal of powder upon the purse, and then made a train from that which he had thrown loose upon the purse—the train reached about two yards—after this he goes in a third time, and fetches out a pair of tongs, red-hot, and which he had prepared, I suppose, on purpose, and first setting fire to the train of powder, which singed the purse, and also smoked the air sufficiently. But he was not content with that; but he then takes up the purse with the tongs, holding it so long till the tongs burned through the purse, and then he shook the money out into the pail of water; so he carried it in. The money, as I remember, was about thirteen shillings, and some smooth groats and brass farthings."

When Voltaire was ordered by the senators of Geneva to quit the dominions of the little republic in twenty-four hours, that incorrigible scoffer at all things venerable and sacred replied, "Magnificent sirs, it requires only three minutes!"

ECHO SONG.

"Canary birds!"—the peddler cried,
But scarce had said the words,
Ere Snooks, the joker, prompt replied,
In echo—"Nary birds!"

A TIPPERARY FAIR.

THE day of the fair was cold, wet, and raw, in spite of which the street and market-place were crowded and jammed with men in swallow-tailed coats and corduroy small-clothes, every one with his fine long blackthorn under his arm, with cattle, or pigs, or hay under their charge, and women with their skirts pinned in a roll behind and the hoods of their cloaks drawn over their heads. with little donkey-carts containing a buuch of poultry, or a basket of eggs, or crocks of butter. The bustle and argument of buying and selling went on through the day, every bargain being conducted with an earnestness of voice and gesture that would make you think that the parties would instantly come to blows, whereas they might be the best friends in the world, and the odd shilling that made the "differ" necessarily going for two quarts of beer and "screebing" hot punch. The public-houses were blocked with the throng pouring in and out; the stall-women, who sat under their umbrellas along the curb-stones of the streets, with stands of apples, and cakes, and crockery, and religious prints, and cheap ironmongery, drove thriving trades; a grand conclave was assembled in the old-clothes mart, where a group of a dozen of his or her friends and relatives would be examining and criticizing and chaffering about some tattered old coat or greasy corduroys, with which some shock-headed gossoon was going to adorn himself for the coming Shrovetide; or some flannel petticoat, or stained calico dress, for which some fine fresh colleen, whose blooming cheeks and shining hair would be the envy of a duchess, and whose pink ankles and feet would support a hod-carrier, was looking with longing eyes likewise to be prepared "agin Shroft," which is the general courting time among the peasantry, and amid all this crowd, here and there, and everywhere, the dark brown uniforms of the constabulary.

Towards evening the noises began to grow louder; some drunken man would stagger along singing a verse of a street ballad in that doleful Irish howl, which must be heard to be appreciated, or another would whirl his "kippen" around his head and shout forth a note of defiance. The police were more active than ever in jerking angry disputants from each other, or dragging away the hopelessly drunk to the barracks.

The business of the day was mostly over, the more prudent, which is to say sober, were already urging on their hungry dapples towards their lonesome cabins, under the shadow of the neighboring Galtees, or, in surrounding country-side, the dudeen courting their happy noses with its incense, and their hearts warmed not only with the least taste in life of whiskey, but with the thought of the white shillings in the pockets in the petticoat and the fine wheat loaf for the children by their sides and pennorth of tea for themselves, as the gossips sat as comfortable as you please on the straw spread on the bottom of the cart, discussing the market, and the gossoon, with his legs dangling over the front of the cart, welting into the donkey with a stick. Those that remained were in a different plight; the men were staggering about the streets, with women hanging to their arms trying to persuade them home, or were whacking the tables in the public-houses with pewter pints, calling for more beer, vowing everlasting friendship, or vociferously applauding some singer, whose high soaring voice was celebrating the late Papal Brigade, or the noble Fox Hunt of Tullamore, or the Execution of John McMurrough for the cruel murder of Ann his wife, or any other similar theme of the Irish ballad muse.

All at once shouts were heard, and the first that was to be seen was a knot of men struggling with shillelahs twinkling above their heads, the dull heavy sound of the weapon on the human skull being distinctly perceptible. "Whoo, yer sow!" —the crowd poured out of the public-houses like a swarm of crazy bees. By some magnetic instinct they felt the row. In an instant the original nucleus was lost, and a general engagement going on with the utmost fury. It was whack, whack, and whack again. Stones flew, and men were down and up like nine-pins. Women screamed and fled, or were trampled on by the press as they endeavored to drag out of the crowd a husband, son, or brother, who had got his gruel and was lying on the ground. The doors were all instantly closed, and the sound of the window-glass smashed by stray missiles was frequent. The stalls were upset and the women likewise, that is those who had not escaped by an early retreat. Not all, however. One glorious exception redeemed their fame. A virago of Amazonian aspect and frame, who had a stall for the sale of rusty keys and packets of nails beneath the hotel window, from whence I view the battle, scorned inglorious flight. She was apparently about fifty years of age, near six feet high, thin and gaunt, with iron-gray hair, high cheek bones, small, fierce eyes, and a tongue that had done her angry service to the discomfiture and scaith of withdrawing chafferers during the day. She wore a rusty brown cloak, and was smoking a comforting pipe when the row commenced. In a twinkling the stall was upset, and she sprang up like a Pythoness, with a gesture of despair and rage. She at first made an attempt to gather up her treasures, but being upset in the attempt, revenge drove all thought of mammon from her soul, and kicking off her heavy shoe, she —excuse me—stripped down her stocking, and dropping a packet of her own nails into the toe, she swung the fearful weapon around her head, and delivered it with an emphasis under the ear of the nearest man, that sent him down like a shot. Then stepping over his prostrate form in the thick of the fight, many was the crown that will long be sore after her compliments.

All this took much less time in the doing than it has in the telling. In five minutes the battle was at its height, and in ten the combatants were swept away like the "mist of the morning." The police were utterly impotent to arrest the tide at first. and were swept away or knocked down in an instant, and many a sound thwack, kick or pelt of a stone in payment for old scores they received before they were able to extricate themselves. It was evident, however, from the promptitude with which they acted, that they were not unused to an emeute of this kind and its remedy. A reserve of a dozen men, under charge of a sergeant, instantly filed out of the police barracks and were formed across the street; others who had been on duty with only their swords in the streets, darted in and reappeared with their muskets. In a minute's time a very respectable company front extended across the street, and it felt like old times not so long gone to hear the sharp order "fix bayonets, charge," when the mob took to flight.—*N. HAUNTED.

BY OUR DEPRESSED CONTRIBUTOR.

HAUNTED? Aye, in a social way
By a body of ghosts in a dread array,
But no conventional spectres they—
Appalling, grim, and tricky:
I quail at mine as I'd never quail
At a fine traditional spectre pale,
With a turnip head and a ghostly wail,
And a splash of blood on the dicky!

Mine are horrible social ghosts,
Speeches and women and guests and hosts,
Weddings and morning calls and toasts,
In every bad variety:
Ghosts that hover about the grave
Of all that is manly, free, and brave:
You'll find their names on the architrave
Of that charuel-house, Society.

Black Monday—black as its school-room ink—
With its dismal boys that snivel and think
Of its nauseous messes to eat and drink,
And its frozen tank to wash in.
That was the first that brought me grief
And made me weep, till I sought relief
In an emblematical handkerchief,
To choke such baby bosh in.

First and worst in the grim array—
Ghosts of ghosts that have gone their way,
Which I wouldn't revive for a single day
For all the wealth of PLUTUS—
Are the horrible ghosts that school-days scared:
If the classical ghost that BRUTUS dared
Was the ghost of his "Cæsar" unprepared,
I'm sure I pity BRUTUS!

I pass to critical seventeen:
The ghost of that terrible wedding scene,
When an elderly colonel stole my queen,
And woke my dream of heaven!
No school-girl decked in her nurse-room curls
Was my gushing innocent queen of pearls,
If she wasn't a girl of a thousand girls,
She was one of forty-seven!

I see the ghost of my first cigar—
Of the thence-arising family jar—
Of my maiden brief (I was at the bar,)
When I called the judge "your worship!"
Of reckless days and reckless nights,
When I wrenched off knockers, extinguished lights
And finished it up with unholy fights,
Which I strove in vain to hush up!

Ghosts of fraudulent joint-stock banks,
Ghosts of "copy, declined with thanks,"
Of novels returned in endless ranks,
And a thousand more, I suffer:
The only line that'll fitly grace
My humble tomb, when I've run my race,
Is "Reader, this is the resting place
Of an unsuccessful duffer!"

I've fought them all, these ghosts of mine,
But the weapons I've used are sighs and brine,
And now that I'm nearly forty-nine,
Old age is my only bogy;
For my hair is thinning away at the crown,
And the silver fights with the worn-out brown;
And a general verdict sets me down
As an irreclaimable fogy! [Fun.

AN old Yorkshire clergyman, who had a strong-lunged curate, inquired of a woman why her husband was so seldom at church. "Oh," she replied, "that young man you've got roars sae loud that John canna sleep sae comfortable as he did when preaching yourself sae peaceably."

A NARROW ESCAPE—"SAVING HIS BACON."

AT the period when Murat was about to invade Sicily, the Chevalier R——, paymaster-general of the Neapolitan forces, was travelling through Calabria, for the purpose of joining the army, having been to Naples to make arrangements for the transmission of a quantity of specie. He had sent on his servant before him. to prepare his quarters at the town of—— expecting to arrive there himself at nightfall; but the day being very sultry, he had loitered on the road, and at nine o'clock in the evening found he was still a considerable distance from the proposed end of his journey. He was so much harassed and fatigued, that he determined to put up for the night at the first convenient house. He at length entered an old, romantic building on the roadside, inhabited by a man and his wife, the former a stout, muscular figure, with a swarthy countenance, almost wholly shrouded in a mask of bushy whiskers and moustaches. The traveller was received with civility, and, after partaking of a hearty supper, was conducted up an old crazy staircase to his apartment for the night. Not much fancying the appearance of the place and finding no lock on the door, he fixed a chair against it; and after priming his pistols, put them carefully under his pillow. He had not been long in bed when he heard a noise below, as of persons entering the house; and, some time afterwards, was alarmed by the sound of a man's footstep on the staircase. He then perceived a light through the crevice of the door, against which the man gently pressed for admittance, but finding some resistance, he thrust it open sufficiently to admit his hand, with extreme caution removed the chair, and entered the apartment. The chevalier then saw his host, with a lamp in one hand and a huge knife in the other, approaching the bed on tiptoe. The chevalier cocked his pistols beneath the bed-clothes, that the noise of the spring might not be heard. When the man reached the side of the bed, he held the light to the chevalier's face, who pretended to be in a profound sleep, but contrived, nevertheless, to steal an occasional glance at his fearful host. The man soon turned from him, and, after hanging the lamp on the bed-post, went to the other end of the room and brought to the bedside a chair, on which he immediately mounted, with the tremendous knife still in hand. At the very moment that the chevalier was about to start up from the bed and shoot him, the man in a hurried manner cut several enormous slices from a piece of bacon that was hanging over his bedstead, though it had been wholly unnoticed before by the agitated traveller. The host then passed the light before his eyes again, and left the room in the same curious way in which he had entered it, and, unconscious of the danger he had escaped, returned to a crowd of new and hungry guests below stairs, who were, of course, not very sorry to perceive that he had saved his bacon.

A STRANGE STORY.—The following strange story is given as authentic in a letter from Paris: "M. Raimondet, a rich old miser, who died lately, left a will, couched in these terms: 'I give and bequeath all my fortune, amounting now to 673,553f. in railway shares, to the young girl, who, having lost the left eye and the right leg, should please and get married to a young man of her own age, handsome, honest, and well educated. If at the death of my friend Durand, whom I appoint as the executor of my will, the peculiarity I mention should not have been met with, I wish all my property to be shared between the various bureaux of benevolence in our good city of Paris.' In order to carry this will into execution, Durand, who is also very rich, sought for some time a young girl who should be in the condition required by it. A few days ago, however, while passing along the Rue St. Honore, he perceived in a small linen-cap shop a young girl who was trying on a cap for a customer, and who had not the use of the right eye. He went into the shop and asked for some handkerchiefs, and was delighted to find, from the noise of the mechanism, that the girl had a wooden leg. In the evening he returned to the shop and followed her home to the Rue Montmartre. He afterwards made some inquiries, and found that the girl was engaged to be married to a young man named Adrien D——, a clerk. A week afterwards, when the young couple with their friends were about to terminate their nuptial evening by a modest repast, to the astonishment of all present, M Durand entered and seated himself without ceremony at the table, and made known the dispositions of the will. It is almost unnecessary to say that some additions and improvements were made in the bill of fare, and the first toast was to the memory of the testator. The newly-married pair have just left Paris with the intention of spending the honeymoon at Nice."

SOFT SOAP FOR ALL. — For a lieutenant call him captain; for a middle-aged lady, kiss her, and say that you mistook her for her daughter; for a young gentleman rising fifteen, ask his opinion respecting the comparative merits of a razor; for young ladies, if you know their color to be natural, accuse them of painting.

A GENTLEMAN who had been rather a hard master, being on his death-bed said to a servant: "Ah, Tom, I am going a long journey; worse than ever you drove me." "Be easy," replied Tom, "Don't be at all discouraged; the journey is all down-hill."

COUNTERFEIT CONUNDRUMS.

IT frequently surprises the student of nature to discover how universally the disposition to over-reach and take undue advantage exists among his fellow-men. It is not only in ordinary business circles that we meet with this roguery, for it penetrates even to the regions of science and art. To prove this assertion, it is only necessary for me to give a few instances of deception practiced, or attempted to be practiced, upon myself, by unprincipled persons who have offered to me, at various times, more or less skilfully executed, yet spurious conundrums. It was not more than a month ago that there entered my office an individual of the class called "Freedmen." He was badly dressed and of uncouth manner. His forlorn apology for a hat hung from one hand, while in the other he clutched a dirty slip of paper. His story ran thus:

When Sherman's army passed through South Carolina, his master's house, the negro quarters, barns, granaries, and buildings of every kind, were burnt to the ground. Everything—furniture, clothing, and provisions—were utterly consumed, and the owner of the plantation, his family and servants, were obliged to seek food and shelter as best they could. "Nobody saved nothin', sah, but this yere boy, and all I got, sah, was dis yere riddle. I knowd it was wuth a lot of money, for old massa was allus mighty keerful ov it, and only brought it out when there was company up to de house, and so I fotched it along all de way to dis yere town, and dey tell me yere, sah, dat yon was de man to buy it, sah."

"Are you sure it was originally your master's; and why didn't you return it to him?"

"Oh, sah, old massa he went Souf and I come Norf, and I nebber see him no more, sah; and it was his'n, sure, and I lebe it to all de oder cullud people down dare, sah, if it wasn't his'n, and to old massa hisself, if you ebber see him, sah."

"Well, what is it? Let me hear it, and then we will talk more about your right to it."

"But how much will you gib me for it, sah?"

"I can say nothing about that until I know what it is. Read it, if you know how."

"Oh, I can't do dat, sah, but I remember it, and if you buys it, sah, you can read for yourself. Yere it is, sah: 'Why are perch from Bangor (up in Maine) like the Waberly Nobbels? Kaze dey come from de Pen-ob-scot.' Now, what'll you gib me, sah, for dat?"

I mildly rose from my chair, opened the door, and motioned the Freedman once more into the free air of the North. "Never again," said I, as he shuffled away, "do you attempt to pass off that thing as a white man's conundrum."

I frequently receive by letter conundrums of so evidently spurious character, that the senders would never have dared to present them to me in proper person. I will give a few specimens. The following was sent to me by a lady of no doubt a highly romantic turn of mind:

"Why is a young sailor, whose birthplace was in the tempest-shaken maintop, like a lamb in the talons of the fierce Lammergeyer of the Alps? Because he was born aloft."

I wrote to the young lady, thanking her for the pleasure of perusing her manuscript, and offering to return it by mail, on receipt of the requisite stamps; but the stamps never came.

This is from a little girl:

"Why is a boy, sticking on the horns of a wild bull, like a fashionable dress? Because he is gored."

I sent her sixpence.

The following came signed "A Boot-Black Boy:"

"What's the difference between most of the people at the street fruit-stands and the burning of the buildings on Broadway and Fulton street the other night? The first are fig-buyers, and the others big fires."

A young fellow came to me, the other day, for medical treatment, and after I had written him his prescription he made me the offer of a conundrum in lieu of the usual fee. I told him that if it was of sufficient value it would suit me as well as money, and he thereupon asked me if I knew Thomas Nast, the artist of the Opera Ball cartoons.

"Certainly I do," I replied.

"Well, what is the difference between his brother, up at the circus in Fourteenth street, and—"

"He has no brother in the circus," said I.

"Yes, he has," said he; "don't you know him—Jim Nast?"

"Never mind the conundrum," I cried; "I'll take the money, if you please."

Walking up Broadway, a short time since, I was touched on the shoulder, from behind, by a man who asked me if I had lost a conundrum.

"No," said I, feeling in my pockets, "I have not. Why do you ask?"

"This fellow here, behind us, has just found one—I saw him pick it up, and I thought it might be yours."

"Not at all," I said, and prepared to pass on.

"But, sir," said the man, seemingly quite anxious about the matter, "it won't do to let this man walk off with so valuable an article. I have no time to attend to the matter. I am going to Philadelphia by the cars, in about twenty minutes, and must either leave it to you, sir, or let the fellow off with his booty. Come, step aside here, and we will consider the matter as quickly as we can;" and so saying, he led the other man (of whom he had taken hold as he spoke to me) and myself to the shelter of some steps, and there we held our consultation.

"Now," said the man who had spoken before, "If this is not yours, the best thing that can be done is for you to take charge of it, give this fellow a little something as a reward, and take the conundrum to the police station, where the owner will soon claim it and return to you the trifling sum you may have advanced for it. I would pay him myself, but I am going away, and, as you look like an honest man, I am content to leave the matter in your hands."

"No doubt," said I, "just let me have a look at that conundrum," addressing the fellow in whose possession it was. He reached it out for me to glance at it, but before he could withdraw his hand I snatched the paper on which the conundrum was written and shouted, "Police!" In an instant the rascals had decamped, running down Dey street like frightened rabbits. Incensed as I was at this barefaced attempt to practice the drop-game on so old a New Yorker as myself, I could not refrain from examining the precious treasure, about which so much solicitude had been displayed. Of course it was worthless—but part of a conundrum, and of no use to any one. It ran thus:

"What is the difference between a dyer of lamb's wool and a person who denies that the Saturday Press is the liveliest of the weeklies? Ans. One is a lamb-dyer and the other a—"

That was all there was of it."

Thinking that I have now said enough to put the public upon its guard against the deceptive attempts of conundrum counterfeiters, I will conclude this paper.

[For the Californian.]

THE DOMINIE'S DISCOMFITURE.

SOME thirty years ago, as nearly as I can recollect, I was living with my widowed mother, in the quiet little New England town of Stoneborough. Our very modest cottage was but a stone's throw from the large, thrifty-looking house and barns of our landlord, Squire Tilden, and the attractive force at the Farm was too great even for the duty of obedience to counteract.

The Squire's youngest son, Tom, was about as mischievous a specimen of the species puer as it would be possible to find, and my good mother was in a continual state of anxiety on account of the influence he possessed over me. And, in truth, it must be confessed that there was an air of authority about the lad, combined with a dash and a vivacious sparkle, that I found quite impossible to resist.

Wherever boyish mischief was found afoot, it was quite safe to impeach Tom Tilden, leader; and when he led—what could I do but follow? If all the blows which I received on that young man's account could be collected into one resonant whack, (for my mother's government inculcated a wholesome fear of the rod,) I doubt not that the sound thereof might circumvent the globe, and return with yet sufficient force to knock down the perpetrator. At least such was my firm conviction in the imaginative period of boyhood, and my ideal revenge upon the Dominie was that he might be obliged to bestow such a blow upon some inanimate object, in penance for the injustice and cruelty we suffered at his hands.

As surely as Tom was indicted for all minor offenses, his brother Levi was referred to for all cruel, hard-hearted and unheard-of tricks. When mean, pompous Captain Morris' old house was burned at night, while being moved up street to make room for a new mansion, built, they said, out of the pockets of his poor, hard-working creditors, the question "Who did it?" no sooner arose than it was answered by natural surmise—"Lee Tilden."

The rusty old swivel, planted in the little triangular common in the centre of the town was fired off in the dead of a still May night—crammed to the muzzle with grass for wadding—breaking many a pane of glass, and frightening people out of their wits. There is no doubt that in every window-broken house, was spoken the name, "Lee Tilden."

The cross old fisherman by the Long Pond refused to lend his boat—the only one there—to Levi, one evening, to take some girls out lily-gathering: the next morning it was found anchored last in the middle of the pond, where none but the most expert swimmer could reach it. The oars were not to be found for several days, but were at last spied by a sharp-eyed youngster, lashed to the top of the tall pine on the bank.

All his tricks, while unequalled in audacity, were original in construction, endless in variety, and so carefully carried out that it was but seldom that any direct evidence could be obtained against him.

He was now nearly twenty-one. A few weeks would leave him free to act for himself, and what would become of him, when there was no longer any restraining power, who could tell? He was a youth of unusually quick perceptions, with but little reasoning power. His principal—indeed I may almost say his only good quality, was a rough, peculiarly developed sense of justice; and where the Fates failed to arrange matters to his satisfaction in that respect, he was prone to take them into his own hands for settlement. Perhaps one reason why his father had so little authority over him, was from the fact that he always meted out punishments on the first representation or impression of ill-behavior, and would never allow the slightest explanation in self-defence. As he seemed to be quite destitute of all the finer feelings—indeed, of all affectionate instincts—gentle, mild, little Mrs. Tilden, although seeking always to be just, had no influence, from her lack of strength and authority of manner.

The only thing that saved him from actually going to the dogs, even at this early age, and with the best of instruction and care, was the strange influence of his brother James, who was a year or two younger than he. I am afraid I can give you but a faint idea of the wonderful beauty and strength of his character. I felt it as a boy, and I admire and reverence it now, as a man. It has been a source of never-satisfied wonder to all who ever knew them, that there could be so vivid a contrast between two members of the same family, brought up under the same influences.

Although at this time James was hardly nineteen, his quiet, dignified, and rather reserved manner, gave him the air of a full-grown man. He was tall and well-made, with a noble cast of features, light hair and brilliant gray eyes. There was in his temperament, no lack of spirit, no dearth of originality; his perceptions were keen, his wit fine; yet there was, withal, an indescribable sweetness and gentleness of countenance and manner that touched all hearts with a very strange emotion of love. He appreciated Levi's sense of justice, and with infinite tact converted it into a lever, by means of which he exercised a power over him possessed by no other person. His patience with his poor brother Ben. was incredible. Benjamin was as superlatively dull, as his brothers were unusually intelligent.

But to come to our story. One bright morning I stopped as usual, on my way to school, for Tom. He was sitting outside the kitchen-porch, busy with the Squire's ponderous old powder-horn. As I came up he whispered, "Look here, Joe! You just keep dark, and we'll have some jolly fun. Been a waitin' for you. Marm's a makin' pies there in the kitchen, meek ez a Quaker. You jist wait a minute and see if she don't hop!"

Boylike, I was always ready for fun, so I stepped behind the door and Tom went into the kitchen, the horn tucked under his jacket end down, and the opening controlled by his finger. Unobserved by his mother, he laid a train through the kitchen, dining-room, and wherever there was no carpet, back again to the door.

Mrs. Tilden started to cross the room with a couple of pies for the oven and Tom touched it off, whispering, "Look alive, Joe!"

Hiss-s-s-s! streamed the powder, like a fiery serpent through the rooms, directly under the good woman's feet. The pies fell from her hands; she threw her apron over her head and, screaming "Goodness sakes alive! It is the Devil himself," she fell fainting to the floor. Tom and I made good our escape, passing James on his way to the house.

"Didn't mean to scare her quite so bad, I declare," said Tom, "but didn't it 'streak her!'" We ran across lots and were soon at the school house door, but the Squire put a rod in pickle for Tom, and he received the full benefit of it when he got home.

The school-house, at that time, was a small red building with an immense sunken slab of granite for a doorstone, before which two large Lombardy poplars stood sentinel. The well, with a squeaky old sweep, stood some five rods away, and a scraggy, close-pruned birch grew conveniently near. Dominie Gibson, however, eschewed the birch and patronized a broad and flexible leather strap. He was a pompous, domineering, middle-aged man, blind of one eye and already quite bald, and rejoicing in an immense Roman nose and a pair of number thirteen feet. He had a voice like the roar of a lion, and a temper so volatile that he completely lost it on the slightest provocation. His particular hobby was the social question—the Abolition of Slavery.

As was usual then, pupils of all ages attended the same school, and Levi, James, Ben, and Tom were all there.

Poor Tom, who was rather undersized and not over-attentive to his studies, sat behind the first form, and I am sorry to say that, though I ought to have done better, I was always next him.

Our principal occupation during school hours was eating chestnuts and apples on the blind side of the Dominie, and firing paper balls over to the girls. The Dominie was well aware of it, but we were so active in our motions, that he seldom caught us. If, however, we were so unlucky as to be detected, upon Tom's devoted back was visited the heaviest portion of retribution, for the mischief continually brewing in his mind showed itself in every feature of his speaking face. Whenever the Dominie grew particularly angry at our general stupidity—at the cold, the heat, or, mayhap, the flies which would promenade over his bald head and great nose—he would reach over the first form, seize Tom by the coat collar, drag him half way over the desk, and, after the administration of two or three resonant blows from the strap, would energetically reseat him with an explosive "There, sir!" As this little performance took place several times a day, it naturally caused much inquiry among the rest of the boys as to how he managed to take it so well. The only enlightenment he vouchsafed, however, was a mysterious shake of the head and the monosyllable, "Grit!" He could not make us believe it, however, and one evening—when we were on a quiet nocturnal visit to Deacon Flint's watermelon patch—he explained the phenomenon in this wise: As he had noticed a tendency on the part of Gibson to make him a sort of atoning sacrifice for the sins and shortcomings of others, and for all annoyances, both great and small, he determined to fortify himself.

Accordingly, he robbed the cat's basket of its old, worn-out shawl, got a big darning needle, some twine, a pair of scissors, and some sawdust, and, safely hidden on the high beams in the barn, proceeded to manufacture a very original kind of armor. With much pains and patience, and with sorely pricked fingers, he succeeded after a long time in quilting a goodly layer of sawdust between two thicknesses of the woolen material. This he fastened into the back of his jacket and trousers, and, thus shielded, was able to defy the Dominie's old strap, and won bright laurels for unbounded pluck. The secret was too good to keep, however, and, as we had been sorely disappointed that night in lugging half a dozen great green squashes half way home, in lieu of the watermelons, he told us the story by way of consolation. Levi was not in the secret, and his ire at Tom's many beatings daily increased. It did not seem to arise from any brotherly affection, but from the assertion of his one commendable quality. At last his anger reached a climax, and he paid the poor Dominie in a most effectual manner.

On this very morning of which I have been speaking, the Dominie brought the leather strap down on the desk with tremendous emphasis—which was the signal for the whole school to come to order. He arose in rage—his face as lowering as a thunder cloud. He glared around the room for a full minute, and the smaller of the boys began to slip down into their seats, and to tremble at the wrath which they all knew was about to be visited upon them. All except Tom. The darker the Dominie's face grew, and the more frightened the other boys became, the harder it was for him to keep becomingly solemn. He rubbed his coatsleeve vigorously across his face two or three times, and hollowed in his cheeks, to no avail, and, as a last resort, went to chewing desperately at the forbidden quid of spruce gum. The Dominie slowly drew from his desk a large sheet of paper, and, with great deliberation, elevated it to a height whence it might be seen by every scholar.

"Who has done this?" he roared in angry tones.

To my dying day I shall never forget the sketch thereon depicted. In a rough, awkward manner, was drawn a tree, very like our Forlorn birch, except that from every branch sprouted a vigorous crop of leather straps—the exact counterpart of the Dominie's. Beneath the fruitful branches, close locked in each other's arms, stood the Dominie, in the full glory of Roman nose, bald head, and No. 13 boots, and a huge negro of the thickest-lipped, woolliest-headed type. A small blubbering urchin stood gazing disconsolately over a fence on the one side, and an overseer, having cast aside his whip, apparently as an unscientific instrument of torture, had seized the Dominie's strap in delight, and raised it over the Dominie's broad shoulders—"in act to strike." Underneath was written in straggling schoolboy hand, "Justitia."

Tom's quick eye took in the situation at once. A glance at the ludicrous scene filled his measure of mirth. Out flew the spruce gum, and he burst into a perfect roar of laughter, in which the whole school joined, but not for long.

In an instant the irate Dominie had him by the collar, hauled him over the form, and then and there rained thick and fast the most concentrated and spiteful blows that ever fell from the old strap. Tom yelled, and the Dominie whacked. The whole school looked on—and the girls cried. Presently the Dominie deposited Tom very audibly in his seat. At that moment Lee Tilden left the back form where he sat, and stalked down the aisle. Before he left the room, he turned and looked well into the Dominie's face. His black eyes seemed absolutely to burn with leaping flames. A moment, and the door shut with a clang, and we had seen his face for the last time in that school room.

After school there was, of course, a great indignation meeting among the boys, at which Tom might be said to have informally presided; for he swelled around in an injured manner, with his hands in his pockets, very much of a hero. Many fists were doubled demonstratively in the supposed direction of the Dominie, and much impotent rage expressed. There were even several attempts at the concoction of a plan for revenge, but it was not long before it was whispered about, "Lee Tilden didn't look so at the Dominie for nothing! You just let him alone now! He'll fix him! See if he don't!" And we went home with much confidence in Lee's ability in that direction, and little doubt as to his inclination.

Tom ventured to make a statement of his grievances and the injustice of his treatment to his father, but all the satisfaction he obtained, was, "Well, well! 'Twont do ye a bit of harm. You've got off clear many a time when you deserved a good basting."

A little while after this, hardly long enough for the boys' indignation to have subsided, the Dominie announced to the townsfolk that he would deliver a lecture in the church on the Abolition of Slavery. It was at this time a comparatively new subject of discussion with the people at large, and one not generally favored. It was about the time that a mob entered Garrison's printing office, on Washington street, Boston, and let him down by a rope from the third story back window, into Wilson's Lane, on account of offensive articles in the Liberator. As might be supposed, therefore, the announcement created quite a stir among the usually quiet citizens of our little town. On the appointed evening a fair sized audience met to hear what the Dominie had to say upon the matter, and when they had well assembled he made his appearance. He stalked up the aisle in an exceedingly pompous manner, and ascended the pulpit stairs. He seated himself on the sofa and blew his resonant nose as with much authority. When the people had become quiet, he arose. He fumbled over his manuscript for the first page; he found it, spread it out smooth, and cleared his throat with a mighty Ahem!

Meanwhile, Lee Tilden attired in his best clothes, hat in hand, walked quietly up the aisle. Straightway he continued up the pulpit stairs, coolly gathered the notes from under the lecturer's nose, walked down stairs, and was out of the church, leaving the lecturer and people so completely stupefied at the wonderful audacity, that not a voice was raised nor a hand moved to arrest him until he was beyond reach.

The Dominie for several minutes was speechless with rage; then he informed the audience that he was not to be thwarted in such a manner, and promised that—notes or no notes—he would address them upon the same subject that day week in the Town House; and his edified audience left the church.

The next Thursday the Hall was crowded. Everybody seemed possessed to go—half of them no doubt, to see if Lee Tilden was "up to the scratch"—and never did curiosity pay a more woful price. That very day, Lee was twenty-one. The next morning he was to leave home for a long sea-voyage; but he had sworn, loud and deep, to first pay the Dominie all his dues. Very quietly, he and his cronies—all sworn to secresy, and all well disguised—had routed from some forgotten corner an old tub of a fire-engine, and had attached a hose. It was silently filled at a neighboring mud-puddle and hauled up under the north windows of the Hall. Seizing the end of the hose, Lee sprang upon the engine. The moment the Dominie opened his mouth to speak, he smashed in a pane of glass with the nozzle, and shouting, "Play away, boys! let's douse the Dominie!" he poured a stream of the muddy water full into the lecturer's face—then over the lights, (extinguishing them,) and then over the entire congregation. An indescribable scene ensued—and while the half-drowned men and women were endeavoring to find their way out of the building, the young rascals left their old tub and fled; and until years after, the perpetrators, beyond Lee Tilden, were not known—Lee left that night for his long cruise. Had the affair happened in these days, I suppose the Dominie would have considered himself, in street-parlance, "played out." As it was, he left town the next day, and never showed himself there again, and we boys had the grandest holiday that ever was known, and burnt him in effigy down by the end of the Little Bridge.

A word as to the destiny of the Tilden boys. James is now a highly respected Judge, and, if the time ever comes when we put our best man in the Presidential chair, that man will be he. Ben is a practicing physician. Levi, after cruising about for four or five years, wrote home to his parents in a disguised hand, stating that Levi Tilden of ship ——, died at ——, at such a time, and signed the captain's name. The family went into mourning, and shortly after Lee walked into church and took his place with the family, frightening his mother into convulsions. A few years later, he was lost at sea in some wild expedition. Squire Tilden thought to leave the farm, and the care of himself and wife in their old age, to Tom, but he had no taste for a quiet country life. His restless spirit prompted him to enlist in our army for Mexico, in 1845, and, although very young, he soon won a high rank for his courage and valor. He fell bravely in the Battle of Cherubusco, and when last seen alive, was fighting, Richard-like, wounded and on his knees—seven Mexicans, whom for some time he kept at bay.

"Holden Gray."

An Irish girl was ordered to hang the wash-clothes on the horse in the kitchen to dry. Her mistress shortly after found a very gentle family horse standing in the kitchen completely covered with the articles that had been washed that day. Upon interrogating the girl the reply was "Och, to be sure, ye told me to hang the clothes upon the horse in the kitchen, and the baste is the kindest I ever saw, sure."

The gravest beast is an ass; tho gravest bird is an owl; the gravest fish is an oyster; and the gravest man is a fool.

ROBESPIERRE.

I HAVE so often heard my father describe Robespierre that I feel as I had myself seen that mean-looking, little man, with his ruffles, and his hair elaborately dressed. As it was considered, in those days, that to be well dressed was anti-republican, his elaborate toilet was the more remarkable. My father narrowly escaped with his life, after an interview with this worst of tyrants. He was deputed by the American merchants of Dunkirk, who were suffering under an act of embargo, to take up a petition for its removal from vessels belonging to so friendly a power as the United States. He was to read the petition at the bar of the National Convention; a body of men who were supposed to represent the will of the people, but were, at that time, entirely subservient to the will of one man, and that man Robespierre. He allowed the House to appoint only one committee, called the Committee of Public Safety; to that all important cases were referred, and there Robespierre ruled every decision. Over the door of the committee-room was written, "Engrossed by the affairs of the nation, we have no time to consider private claims."

My father was told that he must read his petition to Robespierre, before he attempted to read it in the National Convention; so he sought an interview with that dangerous man at his own residence. He was shown through a suite of shabby rooms, where the family were employed in household work, to a long unfurnished hall, where he found half a dozen gentlemen waiting to see the despot. There was not a seat in the room, until a door opened and Robespierre entered, in his dressing-gown, followed by his hair-dresser, who carried a chair in his hand for his master to sit on whilst he was powdered. When powder was generally worn, it was the custom to put it on, in some small room or closet devoted to the purpose, and to powder in the presence of another person was considered an insult. That Robespierre should come into his audience-chamber to perform that part of his toilet was a piece of arrogance and rudeness never to be forgotten. The hair-dresser applied the powder-puff until there was a cloud of powder all around him, and of course the dark coats, in waiting, were none the better for it. When the hair-dresser retired, he carried off the chair with him, and Robespierre went up to a mirror and adjusted every hair around his face. He then exchanged his dressing-gown for a coat which his valet brought, and assisted him to put on. That done, he turned to the knot of gentlemen who were standing at one end of the room, and said he was ready to hear what they had to say. Those who spoke before my father did were very summarily disposed of with negative answers. Then he produced his petition, and asked Robespierre to read it. He did so, and returned it, saying, "That petition cannot be presented to the National Convention, for it contains views to change the government." Such words from such a man were equivalent to a sentence of death. My father knew it, and perceived at once what was the objectionable part. The merchants asked for a committee to be appointed to examine the claims of American ship-owners, and Robespierre had abolished all committees but the one of which he was the moving power. With wonderful presence of mind my father took out his pencil, struck out that request and showed the paper to Robespierre, who, on seeing the alteration, said that might be read the next day at the bar of the National Convention. As my father left the hall, a friend who had accompanied him there, said, "We are a head shorter for this." "Never mind," was the reply, "we shall go in good company."

While my father was reading the petition, Robespierre entered one of the galleries, and as soon as it was ended, he moved that it should be referred to the Committee of Public Safety. This quashed it at once, but the reader's life was saved.—Mrs. Farrar's Recollections of Seventy Years.

A Hint about Basques.—Spring basquines are in many instances tight or demi-tight behind, and loose and sack-like in front. This requires much skill in cutting; it requires the eye of an artiste to make harmony out of these two rather discordant essentials—and how few artistes are at command may be judged from the fact that most of these basquines look like the double dominos so often seen at masquerades—one half red, the other half blue.

The large buttons worn at the back on the waist, in imitation of those on a gentleman's coat, should not be worn with the loose front, as they serve to increase the coat-like effect of the back and confirm it in its want of harmony with the loose front.—Boudoir.

Buttons.—The rage in buttons seems to be dogs' heads. Of these there are quite a variety; so that everybody's taste may be suited. The Newfoundland dog is the favorite with dowager-looking dames, who probably imagine some resemblance between themselves and the noble animal. Bright young girls affect the rat terrier's head, and graceful queens of society assume the head of the greyhound. These heads are in all colors. Those in black and brown look most natural; those in green are considered most recherché; but those in pink are certainly most popular. The most expensive of these are painted on ivory and set in gold, but the greater part of those sported on the promenades are photographed on porcelain, and set in mother-of pearl, vuleanite, etc.

EVENING.

OUT of his den, a dark and hosky copse,
A lynx crept, moved by some impatience. Down
The slope, following a scar of last year's storms,
He stole toward the glen, with circumspection.
The dainty vermin, with his roguish ears
Thrown back, and fair and wicked eyes alert,
Soil'd not a lily on his tawny loins,
Nor smirch'd the velvet of his paws, but trod
So deftly that the linnet overhead
Stirr'd not, nor knew the dapper villain
Had been nigh that day.
'T was a wild water
That had plough'd the zigzag channel; for anon
It sped beneath the darkness of a fir,
And from a cliff leap'd sheer into the chasm.
Here the lynx crouch'd, lick'd himself, listen'd,
Then swiftly spied all things within his view.

There was a brook below, splint'ring itself
Amongst the rocks; two chocolate bluffs beyond,
Swarthy in shadow; then an oread queen
That tower'd up and left the meaner trees
A thousand moons ago, and hardly felt
The stripling at her side—elsewhere a giant—
Chafe with his plumy head her flank, what time
The west wind came ill-temper'd from the sea;
And for the rest, a caravan of dwarfs
Slow journeying to a far-off land of gold,
Invading silence with a noise of wheels,
Gruff oxen-talk, and wailing of a babe.

Close by the trail they found a grassy spot,
Shelter'd by pines, wall'd round with wilderness:
Hereon they kindled fires, swung the pot;
And, while the others rested from their work.
The father search'd for healing herbs he knew.

The sun went down, and, high above the ridge,
The white shafts of the Zodiac's light
Piercing the purple twilight, rose and lean'd
Toward the stars, who with their satellites,
Pass'd, one by one, and gazed upon the scene.
And Sirius, he that watch'd the Nile,
And saw the little ark among the reeds,
And saw the Shepherd Kings come up and fight
Against the builders of the Pyramids,—
Great Sirius, through the leaflets of an oak
Play'd with the babe.
A monstrous shadow grew
Upon one rounded surface of the world,
And half the nations laid them down and slept.

MEDICAL ALMANACS.

I AM an invalid. My complaint is chronic, and I am rather glad of it, because the doctors usually give up their chronic patients. They gave me up long ago—or I gave them up—no matter which way it was. It is sufficient that I still live. Yes, I still live, though I have been down under every system from Allopathy to Hunger cure. I have patronized them all, and survived them all.

And I will here confess for the first time that on one occasion when the streets appeared to be clear of my acquaintances, I sneaked into the office of a spiritualist doctor and asked him what was the matter. He went into fits, or a trance, or something of the sort, and proceeded to diagnose me. Now, he said he could "see through my whole system just as easy as I could see through his winder." I was forced to acknowledge the beauty of his illustration notwithstanding his window was so dirty. I could not see through it at all. He proceeded to inform me that he could also see through my grandfather and grandmother and the whole line of my ancestry back to William the Conqueror, and they had all been afflicted with information on the lungs. That, he said, was the matter with me.

(I began to understand why my family had never arrived at distinction—the "information" had always settled on the lungs. With some people it flies into the head.) My complaint, he continued, was chronic and incurable, but he could cure me for ten dollars. He then waked himself up and charged me a dollar.

I gave him up.

Next the old ladies took me in hand. God bless the old ladies! They mean well. I never knew one of them that had not an excellent remedy of her own. They gave me roots and barks and herbs, charms and advice—all of which I took with religious fidelity. One humane matron, I remember, instructed me to steal a piece of meat and bury it in the new moon. While endeavoring to do so, just as I was breaking into my neighbor's kitchen one night he fired at me from his bed-room window—and I fled without the meat.

I consoled myself with the reflection that I had endeavored to do my duty, and if the inhabitants of the moon were reduced to a short crop of meat that season the fault was not mine.

And so the old ladies gave me up.

Many unreflecting people, doubtless, entertain the delusive notion that it is a misfortune to have a chronic complaint, and to be given up. But it is not. It is the beginning of happiness. The human mind rejoices that it is free. The intellect brushes away the cobwebs of prejudice, and the invalid, scorning the ordinary uses of money, sends for a bottle of Patent Medicine. The humane druggist furnishes it, and sends along a dozen reliable "medical almanacs" free. The invalid is almost overcome with gratitude, and his gratitude increases as he reads, for he soon learns that thousands like himself who have been given up, have been at last snatched from the verge of the grave by a single bottle!

It was in this way that I commenced. A single bottle, or rather the almanac, opened my eyes. I began to see things. Here was an abundance of healthy and reliable reading furnished free, and here was a bottle of the precious fluid itself. Here was indeed richness at last.

And wishing to be impartial, I have felt it my duty to patronize at different times nearly all of the invaluable popular remedies of the day. To be sure, my chronic complaint remains: and I am no better in a physical point of view than when I was first given up. But the fault is evidently with me—not with the medicines. It is sufficient that they have cured thousands, as the affidavits and certificates in the almanacs abundantly show. Among them I recognize the name of John Smith, a neighbor of mine—an honest man. Now, when Smith certifies over his own name that a single bottle cured him of a distressing case of chronic cholera of over twenty years standing, I feel bound to believe him. I believe him, notwithstanding I never heard of his severe indisposition at all—for if John Smith is not to be believed, the useful Science of Statistics becomes unreliable, and human virtue is placed under suspicion. I believe him.

But my benefit has been chiefly from the "Almanacs." I have accumulated a large and valuable library of them—a perfect Cyclopedia of Statistics; and I need scarcely remark that the exact science of Statistics lies at the bottom of all philosophy and social reform. In the course of my statistical investigations I have been struck with many remarkable coincidences.

In the first place, I was astonished to discover that any one of the remedies is a perfect panacea for every evil that flesh is heir to. I was next astonished at the large number of persons who are annually given up by the physicians and afterwards cured by Patent Medicines! Such candor on the part of the physicians reflects great credit on the profession; and it explodes the popular error that the doctors are in the habit of holding out unreasonable hopes to their patients after their cases have become absolutely dangerous. But they don't. They frankly give them up—and the patients recover. The concurrent testimony of the Almanacs on these points is perfectly overwhelming.

I might perhaps add to the interest of this article by quoting several columns of the reliable certificates themselves, but the reader can satisfy himself when he comes to read the Almanacs. Enough has been said, I trust, to open the eyes of the public, and start it in the right direction for the field of Truth.

I might drop the subject here; but my duty would be but half performed if I were to withhold from my fellow-beings the benefit of a little valuable advice. There is your new Board of Health, for instance, with their fingers in their mouths, not knowing what to do because they have never read the Almanacs, and because the doctors have not given them up. Let them go to reading Statistics. Let them send a single bottle and an almanac into every house, to be taken according to directions, at bed time, and, my word for it, the people of New York will be proof against all personal attacks of Cholera, the Turkish Bath, the Trichinæ, and other terrible remedies. Thus may the Rinderpest be kept out of Wall street, and thus may New York become prosperous and happy.

Another suggestion: It is well known that our glorious fabric of free institutions is at this time in imminent danger of being torn asunder by an unfortunate breach between the President and Congress about Bureaus. It is all about Bureaus. Congress got up a beautiful new bureau for the Freedmen. The President held that the old one was good enough, and objected to the new one because it had too many money drawers about it, and was moreover an article of furniture not mentioned among the sacred provisions of the Constitution. He, therefore, smashed it with a Veto.

This enraged Congress, and set the enemies of agriculture in that body against the Bureau of Agriculture, because it was understood to be a favorite department with the President. Because the honored head of that Department cannot exactly distinguish between beans and pumpkin seed, they threaten to abolish his bureau. They assert that a man is not fit to preside over a bureau that does not know beans.

The President, it is understood, denounces the movement as revolutionary. It is an unreasonable test, and is intended to deprive the government of the heads of its principal departments. He sees in it an insidious attempt to effect by indirection what Congress has not the moral courage to accomplish by assassination.

And so the gulf widens, and our glorious edifice threatens to totter to its final fall.

And is there no remedy, no Panacea, for our national woes? Is there not something that will bring about a feeling of brotherly love between the President and Congress? I know the physicians prescribe whiskey for everything now-a-days; it has been tried, but it will not answer in this case, perhaps because the physicians have given up the parties. But there is a remedy, and it is the easiest thing in the world.

Let them abolish both of the troublesome bureaus, and in place of them establish a Bureau of Patent Medicines and Medical Almanacs—or, if you please, call it the Bureau of Sanitary Affairs.

Then, instead of able agricultural reports, send out Almanacs, and people will find them equally entertaining and reliable. Instead of seed beans and pumpkin seeds, send to each family a bottle of the valuable remedies. It will cost much less than the reports and seeds, and, if taken according to directions, there will be but little use for beans and pumpkins in a short time.

This ought to satisfy the friends of agriculture. Send an almanac to each of the Freedmen, and by the time he learns to read it, he will be prepared to vote.

At the same time send to each of the late Rebels a bottle of reliable Strengthening Bitters—they will not refuse; none of them was ever known to refuse anything put up in a bottle—and under the extraordinary effects of these truly loyal bitters, the so-called Rebels will soon become incapable of oppressing their African brothers or anybody else.

This ought to satisfy the friends of human freedom. In this way harmony may be restored, and in the course of a few years the Southern States which have never been out of the Union may be safely allowed to come back into the Union, and assist in absorbing the appropriations of Congress.

Here let me remark, the Sanitary Bureau might also keep for domestic use, for the benefit of the Executive branch and Congress, a supply of that useful remedy for a depraved appetite for drink.

I am tempted to close this article with a patriotic peroration, by planting the Stars and Stripes over the new bureau, and leaving its affairs with the Goddess of Liberty. As I cannot see any better way out of it, I will do so—with just one parting word of advice to the reader: Send for an Almanac; ask for a reliable Medical Almanac—and take no other.—O. L. C., in the N. Y. Saturday Press.

THE Paris correspondent of the New York Publisher's Circular gives the following particulars in reference to M. Julien Daniels, lately deceased in Paris: "He was Chateaubriand's private secretary and devoted friend. Chateaubriand, dying, said to him: 'You must come and see me on the Grand Bé, and be faithful to my memory.' The Grand Be is the name of the storm-beaten, ocean-lashed rock at St. Malo, in which Chateaubriand is buried. Since this author's death M. Daniels has lived a hermit's life in this great city. He discovered in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs, not far from the Observatory, and near Chateaubriand's mansion, a hovel, at the back of a stonemason's yard. The stones were disjointed, the window panes broken, the tiles fallen—it suited him. He moved the little he owned into it, and here he lived, without a servant or a visitor. He cooked his meals himself, and never quitted his kennel, except to go to market, or to some circulating library. He studied and wrote. His favorite authors were the Fathers. He was surrounded by pigeons, who perched everywhere, and had covered everything with their dirt. The Lower Bretons are noted in France for their filth, and he was no exception to the characteristics of his race. He never used a broom; spiders had spun their webs in every cranny and crevice of the hovel; add the pigeon guano, accumulated during twenty years, and you may conceive the squalor in which he lived. It was not poverty which drove him to this misanthropic life, but disappointments of various sorts. He died at the hospital in the common ward. He published last year M. de Chateaubriand and his Detractors, but the book was so violent as to be unreadable. He has left a manuscript monography of pigeons, which is said to be interesting."

THE GREAT AND SMALL.—From the cottage to the palace, from the castle to the hovel, through all the imperceptible shades and grades of life and station that intervene between greatness and littleness; from the sage to the idiot, from the conqueror to the worm, fate, in darkness and in silence, with movements that men seldom see and never appreciate, is spinning that small, fine, but binding thread, which weaves their common destiny into one inextricable web. It is not alone that the mouse disentangles the lion from the toils; it is not alone that the stronger saves or destroys the weaker; but it is that every being, at every step, affects the destinies of millions of others, present and to come, and carries on the train of cause and event that is going on from eternity. The dependence of the great upon the small, and the continual reference of our fate to petty circumstances, is a consideration full of weighty moral, and is never to be forgotten.

A SPANISH BULL-FIGHT.

THE following description of a bull-fight is communicated by Mr. T. Sopwith, M. A., F. R. S., to the Hexham (England) Courant:

Before taking my seat I walked round to see the stables, and there saw the men who were to perform, as also their horses. Judge of my astonishment on seeing a small chapel lighted up with candles, where the whole of the men are confessed before they begin their perilous avocation, and where, in the event of their being mortally wounded in the course of the combat, the sacrament of extreme unction is administered. There was no laughing nor joking either among the performers or the lookers-on; the former had quite the air of men who knew the risk they were about to run. The arena is about 100 paces in diameter, and surrounded by a double barrier.

After a flourish of trumpets the arena was cleared of spectators, several soldiers on horseback assisting to expedite their departure. A procession then entered, consisting of two masters of the ceremonies, five picadors on horseback, fourteen banderilleros, including three matadors, all dressed in red or blue silk, richly embroidered with gold, silver or black silk, and two teams of mules, three in each, with nine or ten assistants, to draw the dead carcasses from the ring.

The whole procession crossed the arena and advanced to the front of the royal box, which on this occasion was empty, but from an adjoining box a bunch of keys was thrown to liberate the bulls from their dungeons. The procession retired with the keys, and none but the banderilleros remained. A door in the barrier was then thrown open, and No. 1 bull trotted into the ring. He stopped when he got about twenty paces, and gazed right and left in evident bewilderment. Then, seeing the banderilleros, he quickly trotted after them. They evaded him, and engaged his attention by waving flying cloaks of different bright colors about his head. The bull soon stopped and stood steadily looking at the banderilleros, who advanced close to him and cleverly evaded the several charges made by the animal. The latter was very undecided, and seemed afraid of his opponents. The spectators now began to express disapproval of his cowardice, and there was a general hissing when the bull, on being bravely confronted by Cuchares, turned away. The trumpets now sounded as the signal for another act of the performance to commence. Darts were given to the banderilleros, who stuck them into the shoulders of the bull; they were stuck in, not thrown. The art of so doing requires a very active movement which, by its dexterity, is graceful. It is done when the bull is charging, and the darts—about thirty inches long—are thrust in two at a time. This must be done deliberately, and the place of insertion is a fleshy part of the fore shoulder. No wound during the whole of the performances is inflicted on any other part of the shoulders.

The bull being a coward, the spectators called fuego, and the darts, instead of being plain, were provided with squibs and crackers, which ignited as they entered the flesh, and were seen blazing about the bewildered and now infuriated animal. Six darts were thrust in, and although the wretched animal was wild with pain and rage, he was not thought sufficiently brave; a flourish of trumpets announced the last act, the picadors not having been put into requisition at all.

Cuchares, the principal performer, now appeared upon the scene with a red cloth and a long, thin sword. The bull was completely frightened of him, and it was only after being followed for some time that he showed any disposition to turn upon and attack his persecutor. Cuchares allowed him to charge two or three times, just stepping a foot or two aside, and then, gazing steadily at him, plunged his sword nearly to the hilt in the shoulder of the bull, which immediately fell on his knees, and received a final wound with a poignard.

A second bull now galloped into the ring and at once began to chase the banderilleros, who ran before him with great coolness, and at times waved their long mantles about his horns. As the bull ran faster than the men, the latter must either turn aside or try to baffle him with their bright red mantles, and this they generally succeed in doing. This requires very great adroitness, as well as activity and presence of mind, for if the mantle was not properly thrown the performer would probably step upon it and be thrown down, at the risk of almost certain death.

Picadors were now introduced, and the bull in pursuing the banderilleros suddenly caught sight of a horse close to him; he seemed thunderstruck, pawed the ground, lowered his head, and rushed upon the horse. The picador thrust at him with his lance, but the bull broke right through this defence, and, with a tremendous gore, killed the horse. He then rushed at another horse, was twice repulsed by the lance, but succeeded a third time and unhorsed the picador. A third horse suffered a similar fate, and his rider received a heavy fall, which disabled him during the rest of the day—indeed, the only chance for his life was in the immediate rescue by the banderilleros. This bull was very clumsily treated by the second matador, who failed no less than five times in the attempt to inflict a death-blow, and for which he was hissed by the people.

The third bull made what was called the "best" fight of the day. During his career he charged three horses in the middle of the arena, one after the other, lifting them completely off the ground. The picador was thrown from one of them six paces forward, and lay extended on the ground. The bull was going up to him mad with rage, when Cuchares actually seized him by the horns, and thus saved the life of the fallen man. This act of daring was greeted with tremendous applause. I may say the merit of a bull is judged by the Spanish aficiondo (connoisseur) by the number of times he enters to the lancing charges of the picador, without turning back or appearing to dread the prick of the lance. If a bull does not enter at all, the people have a right to demand fuego, as was the case with the first bull this day, and the president in such a case gives consent for darts to be used with crackers on them.

Of the remaining three bulls a similar recital might be made. The banderilleros, who began with caution and with the air of men who knew what they were combating with, grew bolder and bolder, and it would be useless to describe the several varieties of skill and courage they displayed.

A REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTE.

MY grandfather, a revolutionary soldier, was accustomed to relate the following among the incidents of his experience during "the war:"

It was during the famous Jersey campaign, 1777-8. Attached to the company to which he belonged was a private soldier, an inveterate fault-finder, sour, crabbed, perpetually "disgruntled" about something; but who, nevertheless, was never suspected of a leaning toward the enemy, and had always done his duty as a good soldier of the continental army. On one occasion, a lieutenant and part of his company, including the subject of our story, were sent out on a scouting excursion, instructed to watch the movements of a body of the enemy who were prowling in the vicinity. It was a very warm day, and the party, after a three hours' tramp, came in sight of the foe who, being in greater numbers than was anticipated, compelled the lieutenant and his men to use "the better part of valor," and prepare for a retreat. On this "old Grouty," as he was called, lowered his musket, broke forth into a tirade against military duty in general and scouting parties in particular, and finished by declaring that he had done enough for one day and was determined to remain where he was for the remainder of it. To the representations of his comrades that he would be captured by the enemy, he replied, that such an event would be preferable to any farther exertion, and stay he would and abide the result. After exhausting argument and entreaty, the lieutenant informed him that rather than suffer him to be taken by the British and give them the information they would seek concerning our forces, if he persisted in his determination to remain, he must shoot him in order to secure the general safety. The reply was: "Shoot and be hanged; I shall stay where I am."

On this a hurried consultation was held by the officer with his men, and it was resolved to experiment with him, and avoid, if possible, the sacrifice of his life. He was told to take a seat upon a log in the woods where they then were, and, to avoid alarming the enemy by a general volley, a single soldier from behind was to send a bullet through his heart. The announcement was received with a dogged resignation and an unaltered purpose. All being ready, the soldier detailed as executioner, at the word of command, fired a blank cartridge, while, by pre-arrangement, a second simultaneously threw a small pebble smartly at the spot intended to be hit. The man fell and groaned, and the lieutenant approached, expressed his opinion that the wound was mortal, and his sorrow that his duty compelled him to the measure, bade him adieu, and then led his party to the rear, where they concealed themselves to watch the result.

The martyr to stubborness lay for some time, uttering an occasional groan, varied with maledictions upon the service, his fate, the red-coats and his comrades. His wrath toward the latter seemed to be kindled by the bungling manner in which they had performed their duty, leaving him to a lingering death, instead of dispatching him at once. At length, with a dolorous exertion, he raised himself on his elbow and looked over and beneath his shoulder, as though to determine the nearness of his exit by the quantity of blood that had issued from his wound. Apparently astonished at finding none, he next with slow, but seemingly less painful movements, commenced feeling behind his back for traces of the bullet-hole. Unsatisfied with this, he raised himself to a sitting posture and with much exertion took off his coat, and, finding no perforation, the truth and the trick flashed upon him at once, when, seeing some stragglers of the enemy in the distance, he started up, seized his musket, and ran, as none had ever seen him do before, toward the American lines. He arrived long in advance of the lieutenant and his party, who had never occasion thereafter to censure the baffled subordinate.—Correspondence Springfield Republican.

A CERTAIN old woman came to Gratia, the emperor, and with much clamor complained to him of her husband, to whom the emperor mildly said: "Woman, what are these things to me?" "But," said she, "he has also spoken many things against your majesty." To which his majesty replied: "Woman, what is that to you?"

LIFE IN PARIS.—A letter from Paris says: "The musical mass of Abbé Liszt was executed yesterday at the church of St. Eustache. The crowd was tremendous, although the price of each chair was twenty francs. At nine o'clock every spot was covered by a dense multitude, among which the fair sex decidedly prevailed, each vying with the other in the costly magnificence of her toilet. The 'Kyrie Eleison' produced a great sensation; the choruses wanted strength to throw out the effect of the exquisite delicacy of this great artist's execution, which, in consequence of the great size of the church, was somewhat lost in the distance. Regret was expressed that the soprano solos had not been given to women's voices. The abbé's execution of Mendelssohn's 'March,' on the organ, was splendid, and was in fact the event of the day. While this musical ceremony was taking place at St. Eustache, another of a different kind occurred at St. Roche. The eloquent and popular preacher, Père Mingeard, inveighed in strong language against 'those women of the world—wives and mothers—who strive to compete with courtesans.' The Marquis D—— exclaimed, on quitting the church, 'he expresses himself well, but he does not raise his voice sufficiently; doubtless, he was afraid of being heard outside the church.'

"A most touching scene took place yesterday at Père-la-Chaise. Gravediggers were seen to be at work around a vault, and finally to disinter a coffin. A young widow literally bathed in tears of real sorrow, watched the proceedings, accompanied by two old friends. A few strangers stood silent and respectfully at a little distance, not attempting to intrude their curiosity on the little group. The coffin was raised at last. It was pouring rain. The young widow suddenly unclasped a brooch, and, throwing a shawl over it, closely followed the bearers, as they carried the remains of the once brilliant and popular De Morny out of the cemetery, whence they have been conveyed to the resting place prepared under the Duchess' directions at Chateau de Nardes for their reception."

WEIGHT OF PEOPLE.—We read in All the Year Round what is the average weight of man? At what age does he attain his greatest weight? How much heavier are men than women? What would be the weight of fat people, and what of very fat people? M. Quetelet, of Brussels, some years ago, deemed such questions quite within the scope of his extensive series of researches on man. He got hold of everybody he could everywhere, and weighed them all. He weighed the babies, he weighed the boys and girls, he weighed the youths and maidens, he weighed men and women, he weighed collegians, soldiers, factory people, pensioners—and, as he had no particular theory to disturb his facts, he honestly set down such results as he met with. All the infants in the Foundling Hospital at Brussels for a considerable period were weighed, and the results were compared with others obtained in similar establishments in Paris and Moscow. The average returns show that a citizen of this world, on the first day of his appearance in public, weighs about six pounds and a half—a boy baby a little more, a girl baby a little less. Some very modest babies hardly turn the scale with two pounds and a half, while other pretentious youngsters boast of ten or eleven pounds. M. Quetelet grouped his thousands of people according to ages, and found that the young men of twenty averaged 143 pounds each, while the young women of twenty have an average of 129 pounds. His men reached their heaviest bulk at about thirty-five; but the women slowly fattened on until fifty, when their average was 129 pounds. Men and women together, the weight at full growth, averaged almost exactly 140 pounds.

TO CLEAN SILK.—White silk is best cleaned by dissolving curd soap in water as hot as the hand can bear, and passing the silk through and through, handling it gently, and rubbing any spots till they disappear. The silk should then be rinsed in lukewarm water, and stretched by pins to dry. Flowered white silk is best cleaned by bread crumbs rubbed on by the hands. Black silk is best cleaned by some ox gall, put into boiling water. The silk should be laid out on a table, and both sides sponged with the gall liquor, then rinsed with clear water. A very little gum arabic or gelatine may be dissolved in water, and passed over the wrong side of the silk, which should then be stretched out on pins to dry. Colored silks are cleaned with so much risk, that it is better to send them to a scourer.

M. EMMANUEL GONZALES is a Parisian writer, who must enjoy some favor, for his works sell, and Le Siecle publishes them as fast as he writes. They are said to amuse petty tradesmen and their families. His evil genius prompted him to read a short story in public. He was frightened out of his wits; he read wretchedly. The audience sneezed, coughed, moved their chairs. Ten minutes after he appeared it was impossible to catch a word he said. Some joker at last bawled "Louder!" his tone evidently signified: We have had enough! The reader took the hint, closed his book, rose, bowed, and retreated from the stand.—American Literary Gazette.

GEORGE PEABODY.

THE tendencies and habits of this age are opposed to the growth and extension of individual influence, and a great reputation is, now-a-days, a rare and arduous attainment. The extension of civilization, education, and the progress of free government, have, by the advancement of the people, produced such an uniformity of intelligence, as to render personal pre-eminence more difficult than when rank and station were more powerful than they are now, and the masses more dependent and degraded. In these modern days, very few people acquire a pure and honorably-deserved fame. Notoriety is very common, and easily acquired. It can be attained by bluster and charlatanism, but that eminence which is the reward of philanthropy, which follows the distribution of some great public happiness, and which is attained by elevating humanity—by bestowing some good in which a whole community shares, and the influence of which is as wide as civilization itself—such eminence is infrequent, too much so for the honor of human nature. If, then, true distinction is to be measured by this standard of "the greatest good to the greatest number"—if benefactions to our race constitute true nobility—we know no name of this present day more deserving of honor and preservation than that of George Peabody. A short biographical reference to this gentleman, which we glean from the new American Cyclopædia may not be without its lesson and influence.

Mr. Peabody was born in Danvers, Mass., in 1795. His parents being poor, he had no other education than that conferred by a public school system which, in completeness and educational opportunities, was immeasurably inferior to that of to-day. From his eleventh to his fifteenth year, he was a clerk in a grocery; and then he held a similar situation in his brother's dry goods store until he removed to Georgetown, D. C., where he went into business in his own name, although still a minor. In 1814, he formed a partnership with Mr. E. Riggs in the wholesale dry goods business—he having the management—the capital being furnished by his partner. The next year the house was removed to Baltimore, and, seven years later, such was its success that branch houses were established in New York and Philadelphia. Mr. Peabody, in 1827, went to Europe for the first time to purchase goods; and, in several of his subsequent visits there for the same purpose, he had intrusted to him, by the State of Maryland, important negotiations, which were prosecuted with success. In 1837, he took up his residence in England, and six years later he withdrew from the firm of Peabody, Riggs & Co., and established himself in London as a banker. During the disastrous financial crisis of 1837, it was through his personal influence and exertions that confidence in American responsibility was maintained. To the State of Maryland he rendered repeated and important services for which he refused all compensation. In 1852, at the bi-centennial anniversary of his native town, Danvers, he sent a toast in a sealed envelope which was not to be opened until the day of the anniversary. The toast was, "Education a debt from the present to future generations." And in order to pay his proportion of that debt, he sent a check for $20,000, which, with subsequent gifts, increased the amount to about $70,000 for the foundation of an institute and lyceum. To the first Grinnell expedition he contributed $10,000; to the city of Baltimore he has given $500,000 to found an institute for the promotion of science, literature, and the fine arts, and to the city of London, for the education of its poor, he has contributed a fund of more than a million and a quarter of dollars.

We challenge the charities of the world to show such judicious, appropriate, and generous gifts, and in the bestowal of which has been displayed such an absence of all pretension, vanity, and self-glory. These contributions have been made from his strong sympathy with the sons of toil, and his constant recognition of the claims of labor and poverty on wealth and affluent ease; impressed as he is with the belief that in the education of the masses is not simply the source of national greatness and prosperity, but national honor and stability. In recognition of such influences as the legitimate and inevitable results of such charities, and in acknowledgment of the great and good heart which bestowed them, did the Queen address Peabody the letter which has recently been published, and which is as honorable to her feelings as a woman as it is creditable to her enlightened and liberal policy as a sovereign. He had refused the official distinction she sought to confer by an Order, and he had declined also that most alluring temptation—a baronetcy. Of all the offers she made, he accepts nothing but her miniature—an honor which carries with it something of a personal character—something of that true heart which, although under the ermine and purple of royalty, beats not the less tenderly and womanly. Such a recognition of the eminent services Peabody has rendered to the poor of London is a matter of national concern and pride, and it will go a great way in softening the asperities which grew out of the late war.

> "Where Britain's foremost names are found
> In peace belov'd, in war renown'd;"

So long as benevolence, philanthropy, and the elevation and advancement of the human race are recognized as the highest qualities of genuine greatness, and so long as we venerate the true image of man, just so long must gentlemen everywhere offer homage to the unmatched goodness and nobility of George Peabody.

VICTOR HUGO'S LAST NOVEL.*

THE incautious reader who takes up this work as he would take up the latest novel of Miss Braddon or Mrs. Henry Wood, with no loftier aim than that of being interested in the story, would show himself unworthy of the didactic teachings of the talented author. For, under the thin disguise of romance, M. Victor Hugo really furnishes the perfect culmination of that truly remarkable system of philosophy which he has been thirty years in evolving:

"Religion, society, and nature," he says in his preface, "such are the three struggles of man. . . . Man deals with difficulty under the form superstition, under the form prejudice, and under the form element. A triple ananké weighs upon us: the ananké of dogmas, the ananké of laws, the ananké of things. In Notre Dame de Paris the author has denounced the first; in Les Misérables he has pointed out the second; in the present work he indicates the third."

This explanation, which exhibits not only the pleasing proportions, but the ingenious obscurity of the charade—the answer to which might be the Philosophy of Victor Hugo—is kind, if not clear. Other novelists have contented themselves with sequels; fired by the success of the Three Guardsmen, M. Dumas gave us Three and Thirty Years After; but we believe M. Victor Hugo is the first writer who creates in three consistent, though disconnected, romances, what might be called a Pessimistic Trinity. Undoubtedly, Charles Dickens, in Bleak House, intended to show the ananké of Chancery litigation, Thackeray the ananké of snobbism in Pendennis, but, alas, they lacked the insight to construct a perfect system of Fatalism in three volumes.

The show which follows, however, falls somewhat short of the preliminary flourish of trumpets before the booth. There is but one "Toiler of the Sea," Gilliatt, but he, by the extraordinary magnitude of his own labors, makes up for the deficiencies of the rest. It is evident from the first that he is the consecrated hero who is to fight against the "ananké of things." He is a kind of amphibious Bayard—in all but the graces—a sagacious longshoreman, whose practical information, not in itself very remarkable, leads the superstitious islanders of Guernsey to believe him to be a sorcerer. In the opening chapter his destiny is forecast by a "charming young girl," Deruchette, who writes his name in a freak of maiden fancy on the snow. There is, doubtless, something prophetic in this meeting, for we are told that the snow rarely falls in Guernsey, and the record is, of course, soon obliterated. Gilliatt falls bashfully in love with this maiden, to whom he has never addressed a word, and who is the adopted daughter of "Mess Lethierry," a retired sailor, whose love is divided between The Durande, the first steamboat built at Guernsey, which he owns, and Deruchette, who holds his affection through the charm of a "small white hand." Gilliatt's bashful passion at last finds vent in a singular manner. He procures an instrument which M. Victor Hugo persists in calling "a bugpipe" (le bugpipe) and learns to play Deruchette's favorite air, "Bonnie Dundee." When we reflect that a bagpipe is not usually considered successful as an instrument for serenading, and when we remember that M. Gilliatt was a new beginner, and probably had neither this extraordinary instrument nor the foreign air entirely under control, we do not wonder that Miss Deruchette did not immediately reciprocate. But the ananké of things commenced here. The ananké of the "bugpipe" had to be overcome by Gilliatt—and from the serene heights of philosophy, the triple ananké of dogma, of laws, of things, as severally expressed in three volumes, looked down upon his terrible struggle with this Scottish instrument.

The captain of Lethierrry's steamer is the Sieur Clubin, noted for his piety, honesty and general integrity. As an evidence of his marvellous probity, we are told how, some years previous, he detected the deceit and dishonesty of Mess Lethierry's former partner Rantaine, and forewarned his master that one day Rantaine would decamp with the partnership funds, which he did. On the last trip of the Durande, the Sieur Clubin recognizes the rascal Rantaine at St. Malo. The pious Clubin then procures a revolver—which is described by M. Hugo with all the adornment of poetry and rhetoric—surprises Raintaine just after that gentleman has pushed a coast-guard from the cliff, and coming upon him with the revolver, demands the restitution of fifty thousand francs, the amount stolen from his old employer. The villain succumbs to this civilizing weapon, and hands over the money to Clubin, who pockets it and proceeds on his trip. A thick fog comes on; the pilot is drunk; the captain takes the helm; the steamer strikes, and is driven by the waves between two high rocky pillars of a dreadful shoal. The passengers and crew are hurried into the boat—all except the lofty Clubin, who heroically announces his determination to stay with the shattered and sinking craft. In vain they implore him to desist—he is adamant. Solemnly and respectfully they leave him—and his fifty thousand francs—alone in the ocean. The pious, courageous and devoted Clubin bursts into a fiendish laugh! Why does the incomparable Clubin laugh fiendishly? Why—you wretched and deluded Anglo-Saxon—why, because he's a hypocrite; because he has carefully plotted this shipwreck to avail himself of this fifty thousand francs, and wipe out all record of his crime! He will escape by swimming—he is an excellent swimmer. They will think he has perished. Ha! ha! He folds his arms. "He ventilates his soul!" A life of studied hypocrisy culminates thus grandly.

With all respect to M. Hugo, this wholesale destruction of ship and cargo, this studied but reckless sacrifice, is totally incommensurate with the result obtained. We are painfully reminded of Charles Lamb's episode of the origin of roast pig and the sagacious mandarin who burned down his dwelling regularly for culinary purposes. The Sieur Clubin's plan for making way with fifty thousand francs is stupid and clumsy. It fails, too—for he has blundered. He has wrecked his vessel further away from shore than he intended, and he can only escape by a miracle. He dives, and, as some unseen power catches him by the heel, the chapter closes.

Meanwhile, the shipwrecked passengers arrive safely at the Port of St. Sampson with the tidings of the loss of the steamer. Mess Lethierry is completely overcome. Some one suggests that the vital part—the machinery—may yet be saved. Miss Deruchette impulsively offers to marry the man who shall accomplish this difficult feat. Gilliatt, who has in the meantime mastered his "bugpipe," and saved—observe the fatality of the incident—a young Anglican clergyman from drowning on a peculiarly treacherous rock, silently accepts the challenge. The Second Book is entirely devoted to this herculean labor. On a desolate wreck, without machinery, save that extemporized on the spot, warring with cold, fever, hunger, and the elements, Gilliatt accomplishes impossibilities. He is a giant—a demi-god; he is a "kind of Job of the Ocean, but a Job militant, a Job conquerer, a Job Prometheus." In short, there is nothing in the range of sacred or profane illustration which can compare with this illustrious and remarkable stevedore. If the system of mechanical appliances by which he finally achieves the redemption of the machinery is not entirely clear to the reader, it is the reader's fault, for M. Hugo is painfully explicit. Perhaps for ordinary occasions the ordinary contrivances of civilization would be much safer. We have a description of a storm, which only a landsman could paint. The elements, earth, air, fire, and water, make a personal issue with the indomitable Gilliatt. Even zoology, in the shape of an enormous jelly fish, called the pieuvre, (?) comes to the support of M. Hugo's philosophy, and the oppression of Gilliatt. This remarkable creature is described at length in magnificent hyperbole—in the language of M. Hugo, and not Cuvier. "Compared with the pieuvre," he says, "the old hydras provoke a smile. Homer and Hesiod could only make the Chimeræ. God has made the pieuvre. When God wishes, he excels in the execrable."

But the God who made the pieuvre also made the man who can describe it. The pieuvre is "a sucker." "It is, in appearance, a mere rag floating under water. When at rest it is dust-colored. But enraged it grows violent. Then it throws itself upon you. Fearful sensation! it is soft." Its tentacular thongs garrote you; its contact paralyses. "It looks scorbutic, gangrenescent. It is disease arranged into a monstrosity."—"Une viscosité qui a une volonté, quoi de plus effrayable? De la glu pétrie de haine." The manner in which this sprightly animal devours you is peculiar. From what we can gather from M. Hugo, it must resemble the swallowing of an oyster; it is "the ineffable" of deglutition. But here our author finely philosophizes: we swallow, or take in each other—"Pourriture c'est nourriture. . . . Carniverous man is an entomber; and life is made of death. We are sepulchres." This is something certainly to think when we take our regular victual.

But Gilliatt overcomes this ananké of natural laws, and kills the pieuvre. He discovers in a marvellous submarine cavern, lit up by the blue lights of M Hugo's rhetoric, the skeleton of Sieur Clubin and the fifty thousand francs in a box. He returns home with the rescued machinery and the money. On his arrival, he stumbles upon his intended and the young Anglican divine in a sentimental tete-a-tete in the garden. He gathers enough to know that she is not above her sex's prevailing weakness for young curates, and instantly relinquishes his claim. Not only that, he personally superintends the nuptials and nobly pays the expenses thereof; nay, more, he presents to the bride a trunk of clothes left hy his mother for "Your bride, when you marry." Miss Déruchette accepts with great good taste the clothes, and considering that they were somewhat out of fashion, we are glad to record this solitary act of self-sacrifice on her part. The young couple sail away on an ocean of happiness. But the good sense and philosophy which Gilliatt exhibits in this sad catastrophe, and which should win for him even greater respect than that awakened hy his struggle with the elements, is undone by an act of sublime inconsistency. As the vessel, bearing the happy bride and groom moves slowly out of the harbor, Gilliatt seats himself on the treacherous rock from whence he had once rescued the lucky parson. The tide rises slowly about him—the vessel slowly glides away. The water comes higher—he moves not. The vessel gradually retreats—the ocean gradually approaches: Beautiful contrast of natural forces. He gazes at the sloop. "His eye," M. Hugo pathetically remarks, "resembled nothing that can be seen on this earth. That calm and tragic pupil contained the inexpressible." Perhaps it exhibited that vitreous quality which is popularly associated with great courage and fine social attributes. Doubtless, in its hidden depths, it reflected none of the emerald tint of the ocean. As the sloop disappears, the water closes over the head of the premeditated suicide.

To say that this complete and artistic erasure and wiping out of the principal character is not a beautiful and convincing proof of the ananké of things, is to deny all philosophy. Thoughtless people, who see in this story only the moral that a man may triumph over the elements, and yet fail in subduing a woman's heart, are not those on whom the genius of M. Victor Hugo is dependent for recognition. The story is dedicated to the people of Guernsey, where the author characteristically and affectingly tells us he intends to lay his bones, and by means of which he is enabled to reap a present return of his complimentary post obits. It is at once fascinating and amusing. It is less objectionable in sentiment, hut not as powerful in interest, as Les Miserables. It has all the attitude, but little of the execution, of a great poet. It is unnatural. As M. Hugo would himself say, "* * * its ideas are swollen, rather than expansive. With the exaltation, it possesses the congestion of fever.

THE QUEEN'S LETTER TO MR. PEABODY.—The Queen of England has written the following letter to Mr. Peabody, the American banker, on the occasion of his return to the United States:

WINDSOR CASTLE, March 28, 1866.

The Queen hears that Mr. Peabody intends shortly to return to America, and she would be sorry that he should leave England without being assured hy herself how deeply she appreciates the noble act of more than princely munificence by which he has sought to relieve the wants of the poor class of her subjects residing in London.

It is an act, as the Queen believes, wholly without parallel, and which will carry its best reward in the consciousness of having contributed so largely to the assistance of those who can little help themselves.

The Queen would not, however, have been satisfied without giving Mr. Peabody some public mark of her sense of his munificence, and she would gladly have conferred upon him either a baronetcy or the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, but that she understands Mr. Peabody to feel himself debarred from accepting such distinctions.

It only remains, therefore, for the Queen to give Mr. Peabody this assurance of her personal feelings, which she would further wish to mark by asking him to accept a miniature portrait of herself, which she will desire to have painted for him, and which, when finished, can either be sent to him to America or given to him on the return which, she rejoices to hear, he meditates to the country that owes him so much.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Mr. Charles Spencer, an old resident of this city, while out hunting near Healdsburg, received a sunstroke, from the effects of which he died on the 15th instant. On the first of the month, Mr. Spencer took out a policy of insurance for $10,000 on his life, in the Universal Life Insurance Company of New York, making a single payment of $104.

A COSTLY AUTOGRAPH.—It is stated that an autograph letter of Marie Antoinette was recently knocked down at a sale at Berlin for 7,365 francs. It consists of four pages, holograph, addressed to Count de la Marck; and not even an extract from it is found in any published collection. The sum of $1,473 for a single letter is unusually large, particularly as autographs of Marie Antoinette are not scarce.

MR. G. H. BOKER, of Philadelphia, has just completed an elaborate poem, called "The Story of the Hound."

AMUSEMENTS.

DURING the past week, Edwin Forrest has been playing at Maguire's Opera Houses. The excitement of an auction sale of seats, and the enthusiasm of an opening night, have given way to quietly-attentive audiences and calm and critical appreciation of the actor, more flattering to his genius than demonstrative and ostentatious ovation. It was the same quality noticeable in the audiences which the Keans for many weeks drew to the Opera House, and which is perhaps the highest compliment that could be wrested from mercurial and inconstant San Franciscans.

In another column a correspondent has called attention to the representative-American character of the genius of Edwin Forrest. Good acting has no nationality, but there is much in the physical power, capacity and resources of Mr. Forrest to justify this distinction, and to distinguish him from those actors whose successes have been mainly dependent upon the careful culture which older civilization and more refined communities have been able to extend. In the respect of original and inherent genius, Mr. Forrest is American—with a breadth of physique, volume of voice, and capacity of power truly continental. His very defects have been the national ones of exaggeration and extravagance—defects which Time has remedied in the man as in the nation. Years have mellowed his genius, and curbed the exuberance of youth. Study and culture have done the rest. Between the Forrest of 1840 and the Forrest of 1866 there is almost as much difference as between "Metamora" and "Richelieu."

Nevertheless, in the performance of the latter character last week, Mr. Forrest was occasionally haunted by the Metamora of his youth. His immense physical force asserted itself in spite of the intellect; he did, at times, modulate his voice so as to "roar you as gently as any sucking dove," but it was unmistakably the lion for all that. Yet the fortissimo of a rich and musical voice is much more agreeable than the softest piano of a harsh or strident utterance; and in quality Mr. Forrest's voice is incomparable. Edwin Booth equals him enunciation and inflexion—excels him in quiet emphasis, but falls below him in the natural quality of that organ.

Richelieu, written for and produced by Macready at Covent Garden, London, we think in 1839, is Bulwer's most dramatic play, as it is his most poetical literary production. The strongly-marked character of "Richelieu" became a study for the best intellects of the stage. Macready achieved a great success in it. Forrest introduced it to an American audience at Wallack's old National Theatre, New York, on the following season with a result no less brilliant. The elder and latterly the younger Booth, both won high reputation in the character: and now at the lapse of a quarter of a century Edwin Forrest makes his début as the "Cardinal" in a city that had neither name nor existence when the play was first brought out—to an audience that represented in round numbers the sum of $3,213.

The character of "Richelieu" demands both the simulation of physical weakness and feebleness, and, in the impassioned scenes a vigor of diction and action almost inconsistent with the quieter sentiment of the play. To steer safely between this dramatic Scylla and Charybdis has been the study of the best actors.

In the more impassioned scenes, Mr. Forrest seemed really inspired by "the indomitable heart of 'Richelieu!'" but in homelier and more subdued passages and in depicting the physical weakness of the character, his acting appeared more artificial. In the simulation of the physical phenomena of old age he was inferior to Edwin Booth—as also in depicting the sudden restoration of the enervated powers of the "Cardinal" in the last scene. These defects—spots on the sun's surface, and visible, perhaps, only to the critic's magnifier—are offset by his interview with "Francois," in the second act, and the hackneyed though glorious

> "Fail! In the lexicon of youth, which Fate reserves
> For a bright manhood, there is no such word
> As—fail!"

or, in the third act where he confronts the would-be assassin, "De Mauprat," with both passages were splendidly delivered; so, too, was the threatened launching of the curse of Rome. All the purely rhetorical passages were excellently given; the attitudes carefully and naturally assumed, and even such smaller studies as the answering of a messenger without lifting the head from the abstraction of other duties betrayed the finished actor. Mr. McCullough as "De Mauprat," gave evidence of force and ability in the part; but we prefer to defer criticism until he appears in some more prominent character. Miss Lillie is very young, and lacked force and power in the character of "Julie," but there was a certain charm of freshness and naivette in her reading and personation that won favor and gave promise of better results in the future.

> "To thy knees, and crawl for pardon!"

Virginius was produced on Thursday evening. We can believe that in the opinion of many, Mr. Forrest appears more advantageously in the character of the Roman Father than in that of the Cardinal. In physique, voice, and action, the part requires but little dissimulation. Nature and age fit the actor for the character, and culture and study have perfected that fitness to a point beyond the reach of all living competitors. The piece was excellently played throughout. McCullough, Thorne and Leman were equally good in the leading parts; and Miss Lillie appeared to better advantage in the character of "Virginia," most ably seconded by Mrs. Jackson as "Servia." The attendance has improved as the week progressed, and the dress circle now presents a nightly display of opera cloaks and opera audiences.

Court Favor and the farce of Trying it On will be the bill for to-day's matinée. To-night Mr. McCullough will enact the character of "Charles de Moor," in the Robbers, and give us a test of his quality in a leading part. On Monday that grand old play, King Lear, will be produced. The "King Lear" of Mr. Forrest is said to be one of his greatest personations.

At the Metropolitan, the Mountain Sylph has been withdrawn, to make room for Arrah-na-Pogue, which was reproduced on Wednesday night, with Mrs. Sedley Brown, Messrs. Thompson, Leach, and others, in their original parts. The excellencies of the "Arrah" of Mrs. Brown and the "Michael Feeny" of Thompson are well known; but we must commend Mrs. Brown for giving us so little of stage "arrah!" and throwing into the character so much of womanly grace and feeling. Harry Wall filled the part of "Shaun" very ably. Miss Frances Gass, as "Beamish McCoul," and Mattie Field, as "Fanny Power," were both improvements upon the original cast. Mrs. Brown holds, by purchase, the exclusive right to the performance of the piece in California, and the present is probably the last opportunity the public will have to see the most popular and interesting play of modern production as fully and effectively represented as when it achieved its unprecedented run of fifty nights, several months since. It will be played to-night, and for the matinée to-day.

To-night is the last night of the Circus, and Dave Long, the clown, gives an extra performance for his benefit, with a silver goblet and one of Lamott's best hats as prizes for the foot race. The troupe go to the interior.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Boston correspondent of the New York Weekly Review says:

"It is rumored that we are to have a biography of Hawthorne, from the pen of his widow. She is a lady of fine culture, though her tastes incline her, I believe, rather to the pursuit of art than literature. Many years ago Hawthorne wrote a book called The Gentle Boy, now out of print and generally forgotten. This was illustrated from drawings by Mrs. Hawthorne, which were pronounced very beautiful. Despite the fact that none of our New England writers was so little known personally as Hawthorne—except, perhaps, Thoreau—he is remembered with a feeling of singular tenderness, and his biography will receive a hearty welcome. Mrs. Hawthorne comes from a talented family — the Peabodys of Salem. One of her sisters was the wife of Horace Mann, and another, remaining single, has devoted herself sedulously to literary labor, through a long life. She is universally known in connection with the Kindergarten schools, that are so popular here. Her attainments in literature and science are remarkable; and, although her published works have gained no great reputation, she is esteemed, by those who know her well, a woman of rare powers. In 1849 appeared a magazine bearing this title: 'Æsthetic Papers: edited by Elizabeth P. Peabody. Boston: the Editor, 13 West street. Price one dollar.' Only one number ever saw the light, and I think it would be no easy matter at this day to discover a dozen copies in the city; but this single issue was full of weighty material. In it first appeared Hawthorne's famous article on Main Street; an essay on war by Ralph Waldo Emerson; and a paper by Henry Thoreau, describing his prison experience. He was incarcerated once, you know, for not paying his taxes—seized by the officers of the law while on his way to the cobbler's with a pair of dilapidated boots in his hand. In his narrative of prison-life he congratulates himself on the fact that he got his board and lodging for nothing, and especially that by staying in durance he effected a great saving of shoe-leather. This paper, of which the public, outside of the few who read Æsthetic Papers, have little or no knowledge, will be included in the collection of the author's papers about to be published under the title of A Yankee in Canada."

THE publisher of the New York Round Table announces a volume of piscatorial and epicurean sketches by Mr. Joseph Barber. The book will be called Crumbs from the Round Table, and will be ready early this summer. Mr. Barber is well-known as a journalist and a poet, and as the author of the humorous "Disbanded Volunteer" papers, in several of the weekly journals.

DR. W. H. RUSSELL, the famous London Times correspondent, is about to publish a novel, entitled The Adventures of Dr. Brady; or, the City and the Camp.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.
DR. MAGGIEL'S
Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUNDS.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,

A CARD.
M. Howard's Hair Restorative,
NO. 315 MONTGOMERY STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO.

THE ABOVE PREPARATION, which has been recently discovered and patented, is purely a Vegetable Extract.

The undersigned are fully aware of the many unsatisfactory and useless preparations for restoring hair that have been introduced to the public, and how little confidence is to be placed in any pretensions to restoring the hair to bald heads, but,

HAVING TRIED MR. HOWARD'S PREPARATION,

we are able to state that it not only prevents the Hair from falling out, but absolutely reproduces it, and that we now have good suits of Hair growing where we were entirely bald. Therefore, as a matter of justice to Mr. Howard, and of consolation to bald heads, we tender him this testimonial. Mr H. keeps the article for sale in bottles, with directions for its use, or applies it himself, as may be desired.

PARIS GOSSIP.

Paris, March 20, 1866.

A SINGULAR event took place not long ago which is creating considerable sensation in our fashionable circles. However improbable the story may seem, I am assured of its authenticity, and give you here the true version of it. Near the Palais de l'Industrie in the Champs Elysées is the stall of a woman who deals in maccaroons. This stall is the centre of attraction for nurse-girls and school-boys, who come and stake their sous at a species of rouge-et noir table. The winner gets his cakes for nothing, whilst the loser forfeits the amount staked. Not long ago two gentlemen on horseback, followed by their grooms, stopped opposite this stall, where they dismounted and, going up to the small table, began the following conversation in French, although with an accent which left no doubt as to their transatlantic origin :

"It is understood then, J——, that you take the black?"

"Perfectly."

"For my own part I have a predilection for red."

"How many times shall we throw?"

"Ten."

"Madam," said Mr. J——, "I will begin. You hear that I have chosen the red. Have the kindness to keep account and tell us the result of the game." The game commenced. Mr. J—— won twice and lost eight times. The other won seven times and lost three.

The poor woman was at first terrified at her great loss ; but what was her surprise when the two gentlemen threw each a five-franc piece upon the table and, without waiting either for change or cakes, left the spot!

This scene was renewed nine successive days with the same result as to the game. On the tenth day our two Americans again appeared at about the same hour.

"I presume," said Mr. J——, "that you have kept an account of the result of our nine days' meeting?"

"Certainly," replied his antagonist.

"How do we stand?"

"Strange to say, we have both won and lost the same number of times. Does your account tally with mine?

"Perfectly."

"Then to-day's play decides the question?"

"Exactly. Will you begin?"

"You are very kind ; I will follow you."

In spite of the courtesy of this dialogue, the bystanders who had been attracted to the spot by the singular scene fancied they noticed a bitterness in the tone in which the words were uttered. The two players were as pale as death, and, although the weather was cold, drops of perspiration stood upon their foreheads.

Mr. J—— played, and lost seven times. His companion won twice and lost eight times.

"I have lost," said the latter, "and you shall be satisfied."

They then paid the woman as liberally as before, and, bowing politely to each other, left the spot.

Four days after this the following paragraph appeared in the daily papers :

"A suicide committed under the most inexplicable circumstances has just thrown an air of sadness over one of the most aristocratic quarters of Paris. A young foreigner, Mr. ——, endowed with every gift of fortune, was found dead in his bedroom yesterday morning, a bullet having passed through his brain. All enquiries as to the cause of this unhappy suicide have proved fruitless, and it is supposed that the young gentleman committed the act whilst in a state of mental aberration."

This was all the light that was thrown upon the circumstance at the time, but since the following details have transpired. These young gentlemen, Americans, came into joint possession of an immense fortune by the death of a distant relative. They agreed to come to Paris together and enjoy life. On arriving here they put up at the same hotel and lived for some time together. After a while, however, a coldness sprang up between them and they eventually quarrelled. The quarrel led to the singular scene described above, and the sad catastrophe which followed it.

A very curious and somewhat mysterious marriage took place in one of our mairies a few days back. A most elegantly dressed and highly aristocratic English lady, aged twenty-two, was married before one of our mayors to a French gentleman the other side of sixty. After the ceremony the English lady stepped into a magnificent carriage drawn by four alezans and, with her femme de chambre, drove off to the station of the Northern Railway. The gentleman returned to his modest lodging on a fifth floor, carrying in his pocket an inscription de rente in the French funds for £50 a year. This extraordinary event has given rise to a great many surmises as to the lady's name and her motive for contracting such a singular marriage. As you may suppose, the lady has been the object of many uncharitable remarks.

One of the celebrities of the day, General Jusuf, knight of the Legion of Honor, has died at Cannes. The early life of this remarkable personage belongs rather to fable than to history. It is said that he was born in the Isle of Elba. He entered the French army when only twenty-two years of age, at which time he was a great favorite of the Bey. As in the story in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, the humble slave raised his eyes to the Princess Kabousah, daughter of Bey Hussein, and Kabousah, like the princess in the same story, deigned to look upon him with favor. Unfortunately, there were many obstacles to their union. One day the lovers were betrayed by a slave, who, however, paid dearly for his imprudence. Passing Jusuf's door, on his way from the Bey, Jusuf dragged him into his room. Two hours afterwards the princess received a basket of flowers, and on removing the flowers found underneath them a human hand, a tongue, and an eye, with a note containing the words, "I send you the eye that watched us, the tongue that betrayed us, and the hand that denounced us." Jusuf had to flee while waiting for the princess's reply. Since that time he has distinguished himself in many remarkable engagements, and, by his bravery and intelligence, attained the rank of general, together with numerous other distinctions. His death is deeply regretted by all who knew him.

An incident occurred night before last at the opera, which brought the performance of La Juive to a somewhat stormy close. It appears that M. Villaret had sent word to say that, owing to sudden indisposition, he would be unable to take his part in the opera that evening. M. Perrin replaced Villaret by M. Mathieu, who had long solicited an engagement. M. Mathieu had already appeared as primo tenore upon many of our provincial stages, but it appeared that he was unequal to the boards of the grand opera ; above all, he had to labor under the great disadvantage of not having gone through a rehearsal or tried his voice in the orchestra. It is difficult to say whether M. Mathieu is deficient in talent or not ; but this much is certain, he is not deficient in courage. Laboring under the disadvantages already mentioned and the emotion naturally felt at appearing before a Parisian audience, M. Mathieu broke down in the fourth act, and the curtain fell amid a storm of hisses and other expressions of disapproval. The curtain rose for the fifth act, but the uproar was so great that the performance could not go on. At shouts of "A la porte les claqueurs, the claqueurs left the house, and the director appeared and was received with shouts of "Return the money!" The money, however, was not returned, and Halévy's immortal chef d'œuvre was wound up with the "Femme a barbe," sung in chorus by the more turbulent of the spectators.

Speaking of chefs d'œuvre reminds me of an anecdote I heard to-day. Rossini was at his piano, evidently engaged in deciphering the "Tannhanser." A visitor arrived and seated himself behind the composer.

"Maestro!" exclaims the visitor, "you have got the work upside down."

"Yes," good-humoredly replied the author of "Guillaume Tell," "I tried it the other way, but that wouldn't do."—The Nation.

A BRIGAND STORY.

WE hear constant stories of the outrages perpetrated by the brigands of southern Italy ; all our friends returning from Naples whom we have met here being full of excitement over the perils they have successfully braved, or the misadventures of their less fortunate acquaintances. Dr. W. told us a good story the other day, which has the additional interest of being a true one. An Englishman engaged in the superintendence of some mines belonging to the late Duke of Parma, was informed one morning by his servant that a man wished to see him, who declined mentioning his business to any one but himself. Being much engaged at the moment, he felt half unwilling to admit him, but at last concluded to do so. The Italian stated that he was in possession of information that would probably save him from being robbed, if not murdered, but that, before disclosing it, he required to be paid a certain sum, which he named. This proposition was at once declined, but Mr. M. told him he would give him some trifling gratuity, and if in the end his suspicions turned out to be well founded, and his story proved to be correct, he should be rewarded liberally. To this the man assented, adding, "You are an Englishman, and I can trust your word ; and now listen, and judge whether I speak truly. You propose to visit the mines at ——, on the 8th of this month. You have engaged Beppo Quattrini's vettura and horses, and he himself is to drive you, and you will carry with you so many hundred scudi, for payment of wages now in arrears." "It is true," replied Mr. M., "that I go to the mines on the day you name, and also that I have engaged Beppo Quattrini and his carriage, and that I may possibly have some money with me, though what interest all this may have for you I cannot imagine." "Listen, Signor! On reaching a stone bridge, some distance from Parma, three men will attack the carriage, and Beppo will offer no resistance. You will be robbed, and probably murdered, for dead men tell no tales. And now, does the Signor think my story worthy of credit?" "Not in the least ;" the Signor was not to be moved by such a papera ; with an Englishman's cool disbelief in danger, and dislike to be forced into a ludicrous position, and swindled by an adventurer working on his fears through a clever story, he pooh-pooh'd the whole affair, and dismissed his informant. That night he dined with the Grand Duke, and mentioned casually his visitor of the morning. The Prefect of Police was at the table, and when dinner was over, he drew him aside, and assured him that such a warning was not to be lightly disregarded. "You may be satisfied every word the rascal said was true ; but you need not trouble yourself about the matter. Continue your preparations as before ; keep a silent tongue in your head ; and leave everything to me." The morning arrived, and Beppo drew up his horses at Mr. M.'s, where the Prefect had previously called and given his instructions. "You will take a gens d'arme, whom I shall send you, as your valet, and he will ride beside the coachman ; at the nearest village two more will be in waiting, who will enter the carriage and accompany you to the mines." The start was made. Beppo dared not object to the companionship of the servant, who, as they approached the village indicated, drew a pistol, and placed it to his ear. "Listen, briccone! you are sold ; you are a dead man! if you wink so much as an eyelid, I will blow your brains out, maladetto!" As they approached the fatal bridge, three men, armed to the teeth rushed from their ambush ; one of them seized the horses, but was fired at by the man on the box, and mortally wounded, though at the moment he succeeded in making good his escape. The two other miscreants made a dash at the doors of the carriage, and were instantly shot dead by the men inside. The coachman got off in the end more easily than he deserved ; and it is to be hoped, for the good credit of Englishmen, that Mr. M. discovered and rewarded the man who had given the warning, and undoubtedly saved him from certain death.—English Traveller.

Life in Java.—A traveller writes from Batavia, island of Java : "The Hotel des Indes, at which I am stopping—the main building two stories high, with an immense piazza in front—is connected on each side by buildings like railroad depots, 300 or 400 feet long. Each suite of rooms contains room enough to make two, three, and even half a dozen ordinary rooms, such as we get at the hotels in the United States. In front and back are bath-houses, fountains, flowers, gardens, and outhouses, for cooking and for servants, marble floor, tiled roofs, ceiling from 20 to 25 feet high, no carpets, and but very few curtains. Meals are served up in about the same style as at first-class hotels in New York. The habits of living are different. At daylight, coffee and tea are taken to your room ; at eight, light refreshments ; at twelve, breakfast, and at seven, dinner. Coffee and tea are always ready, day and night, same as baths. No extra charge—take them or not, as you may choose. The hotel is situated in the new or upper town, some half a dozen miles from the water. It is a fair specimen of five or six others, within half a mile of each other. My hotel and ground cover ten acres. The whole ground, like the rest of the city, is one immense forest of trees and canals."

Scenery of Madagascar.—Here, in a humid atmosphere, and under a tropical sun, the spontaneous growth and decay of vegetation has proceeded without interruption for centuries, presenting scenes unsurpassed in the world. The scenery, indeed, is never to be forgotten, especially one part of the road, that wound round the edge of a rapid torrent, which, flowing under a gigantic table of granite, fell in a foaming broad cascade into a caldron hollowed out of the massive rock beneath. The ravine formed by this torrent was superb, and the cascade, swollen by the rains which had now ceased, was seen to its best advantage. The granite table formed a Titanic bridge over the torrent, and holes worn in it by eddies during past centuries showed the hissing waters beneath The magnificent foliage met overhead, entwined with wonderful creepers, shutting out the rays of the tropical sun, and throwing a sublime gloom on the scene, lighted here and there by the bright color and delicate young fronds of the tree-fern.—Lieut. Oliver's "Madagascar and Malagary."

Aunt Emma was trying to persuade little Eddy to retire at sundown : "You see, my dear, how the little chickens go to roost at that time." "Yes, aunty," replied Eddy, "but the old hen always goes with them"

M. Gray, and lying between Mission, Howard, Eleventh and Lafayette streets. The sale will be peremptory, to settle up the affairs of the estate. For terms see advertisement.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; aud his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamatiou of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experieace has given, aad no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either ucute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, us for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

RHEUMATISM.

Throughout this coast a great deal of suffering is experienced from Rheumatism. Weeks and even mouths of protracted and aggravated misery is endured by the victims of medical iuefficiency and ignorance, which could be cured just as speedily as was Mr. Sparrow, whose testimony is given below, aud is only the echo of hundreds of other cases. Dr. Bourne cures without medicines, which accounts for his extraordinary success. No. 10 Masouic Temple, Post street entrance:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1861.

Dr. Bourne: Last Winter I was nearly dead, by an attack of iuflammatory rheumatisu. I suffered the most excruciating paius for about five weeks, without uuy hope of relief, wheu a frieud, hearing of my illuess, called to see me, and assured me that if I would stop "drugging and dosing," aud go to you, that you would have me walking about the streets iu three days. Sure enough, although I was utterly helpless, and conveyed to your house in a carriage, aud carried into it by three stout men, and was by them lifted into the bath, yet, on coming out of the bath I was able to largely assist myself, doing much toward dressing, aud without assistance walked from the bath to the carriage. On the fourth duy, I discharged my carriage and walked with a frieud's aid the entire distance to your house (nearly a mile) aud home again, and so on until cured; and I had not taken more than twelve baths when, all paiu and swelling having ceased, I felt myself a well man. And now I am happy to do this little service of publicly certifying to the simple truth, leaving it to do its owu work among such of my frieuds and acquaintances as may chance to see this. Your frieud, JOSEPH SPARROW.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now runniug daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby prodncing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, und is less liable to get out of order than any of the paus.

Trials made with this machine iu tbe presence of experts, during the last six months, bave been prouounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machiue is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motiou given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechauical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionully increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained.

The peculiar construction of this superior machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quick ilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself.

OCCIDENTAL HOMESTEAD Association,

OFFICE, - - - 305 MONTGOMERY STREET.

CAPITAL STOCK, $33,660.

102 SHARES.....$330 EACH.

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed to enable its members to obtain desirable homestead lots in this city at a cheap and easy rate, paying for the same by regular monthly instalments.

For this purpose they have purchased Blocks 469, 500, and 501, in the Western Addition to this city, bounded by Devisadero, Pine, Broderick and Clay streets.

Subscribers will pay an initiation fee of $5 on each share taken, to form a fund for defraying current expenses, and $11 per month for thirty months, commencing in April, 1866.

The property is within three blocks of the TURK STREET RAILROAD, IS NEARLY ALL ON THE GRADE,
and is most desirably located for Homestead purposes.

It is directly east from the lands of the California Association.

The property has been purchased on very reasonable terms, and offers a rare opportunity for investment.

A number of fine houses are in process of erection, and streets are being graded near this property, which will greatly increase its value.

When twelve monthly payments have been made, the property will be divided among the members in the usual manner, and each shareholder will receive a contract for a deed to the lot or lots to which he may be entitled, and have the privilege of taking immediate possession of the same.

The lots average 27 feet in front by 120 feet in depth. The whole amount due upon any lot may be paid at any time, and discount at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month will be deducted therefrom.

Persons wishing to visit the lands of this Association will take the Turk street cars to Devisadero street, and thence go northerly along Devisadero to Pine street.

Twenty thousand dollars of the capital stock is taken, and the books are open for subscription to the balance at the office of the Secretary, where the Official Map of the Association can be seen, and full particulars obtained.

The Title to this Property is Perfect.
